How a Modern Atheist Found God.

BY

G. A. FERGUSON.

The author desires to assist others who are seeking the light. Controversy is often barren of results; so he has considered that the best way is simply to give his own experience. The problems which he has had to solve, and the difficulties he has had to overcome, must be the very same as are perplexing so many seekers after truth at the present time.

COLLECTS AND PRAYERS

BY

JAMES C. STREET.

CHRISTOPHER J. STREET, M.A., LL.B.

There are many for whom these pages will glow with precious memories. They will recall with thankfulness the spiritual leader, the great preacher, the faithful minister, whose influence on their lives is sacred and imperishable. Among others, who knew him not and were never under the spell of his magnetic personality, there must still be many to whom the devotional outpourings of a simple heart and faith will come with quickening power.

A teacher (or parent), in giving a lesson on some subject, or on some portion of Scripture, often feels the need of an apt, good story with which to illustrate and carry home his lesson. Here, then, is a handy volume of just such stories—stories to illustrate lessons likely to be given to any boys or girls over eight or ten years of age.

Moral and Religious Lessons for Infants

The names of some of the men and women who helped the slave to freedom are well known—such as that of William Lloyd Garrison. Hopper's name is seldom heard, at least in England, but Garrison himself, accepting an invitation to stay with him in New York, wrote: "There is no one in the world for whom I entertain more veneration and esteem than for yourself." Would it not be surprising if the life of the man thus addressed were not worthy of some record?

A STUDY OF HYPNOTISM.

Hypnotism and Disease. By Hugh Crichton Miller, M.A., M.D. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.

OF late years a remarkable change in the attitude of the medical profession towards cures wrought by faith has been apparent. Two years ago the British Medical Journal devoted one of its numbers to a consideration of Medicine and Miracle, in which the declaration of Sir Clifford Allbutt that "probably no limb, no viscus is so far a vessel of dishonour as to lie wholly outside the renewals of the spirit" received the stamp of editorial approval. At the same time, few people believe—medical men least of all—that faith can repair a gross material lesion, such as a broken arm or an ulceration of the stomach. Medical science has, therefore, worked out a distinction between "functional" and "organic" ailments, and has admitted that in the former "suggestion"—a word which it prefers to the unscientific term faith—is a therapeutic agent of remarkable potency. The distinction between organic and functional is not altogether easy to come at. If a physical symptom such as acute indigestion or paralysis of the limbs yields to suggestion, or other mode of mental treatment, then it is functional—an à posteriori mode of decision which one feels is far from satisfactory.

The fact, however, remains that suggestion as applied by medical men has been successful in scores of cases of disease where all other means have failed. Yet even among the thinking section of the public there is very considerable unwillingness to appeal to this method of treatment. We cannot here attempt to analyse the cause of this unwillingness, but there is no doubt that one factor in it is the knowledge that suggestion is frequently used in conjunction with hypnotism, and rightly or wrongly a great number of people have an intense aversion to allowing themselves to be hypnotised. In most cases this prejudice is due to ignorance, or rather to false knowledge. From platform performances and from such novels as Du Maurier's "Trilby" exaggerated ideas of the power of the hypnotist over his subject have been picked up. People fear that if they once submit themselves to the process their will—the core of their personality—will be wrested from them, and come under the control of another. Everyone who knows the marvellous power of hypnotic suggestion as a means of treatment in alcoholism, asthma, neurasthenia, and a host of other troubles, will welcome Dr. Miller's attempt to place the whole subject on a commonsense basis. He seeks "to point out how far the dangers popularly associated with hypnotic suggestion are real, and how far imaginary; to what extent the benefits attainable have been exaggerated by enthusiasts and depreciated by the prejudiced; how far its effects are permanent, and how far transient; why it has so often been mixed up with charlatanism, and how this can be guarded against." Dr. Miller accepts the view that suggestion, and not hypnosis, is the real agent in the cure. Suggestion is to be distinguished absolutely from persuasion which convinces the reason. "Suggestion aims at a psychic change without the reason, and the one condition necessary to constitute suggestion is the inactivity either by diversion or paralysis of attention, called in the one case waking suggestion and in the other hypnotic suggestion." According to this view hypnosis plays the part of the anæsthetic in an operation, which enables the surgeon to perform his duty without discomfort or resistance on the patient's part; hypnosis is the "anæsthetic of the reason."

With regard to the dangers of hypnotism Dr. Miller is reassuring. Like most practitioners of the art, he finds that "in the case of most people it is hard enough to get the patient to execute an unpleasant or even very unusual order given under hypnosis, much less one that is counter to his moral sense." This is as much as to say that even during the sleep of the reason character still tells, just as our habitual and automatic acts really arise from ourselves, although they are often not consciously willed. The title of the book hardly does justice to its scope, for not the least valuable chapter is that entitled "Other Methods of Psychotherapy." Here we find a brief account of modern work in this direction concluding with an outline of the theories of Freud. Freud's work on hysteria and other psycho-neuroses, which we agree with Dr. Miller in regarding as epoch-making in character, although well known on the Continent and in America, is in this country just beginning to receive the attention it deserves, hence the inclusion of this outline in itself proclaims the up-to-date nature of Dr. Miller's volume. The style of the writer is lucid, his tone temperate and scientific. Readers of the book cannot fail to be interested, and they may rest assured that, so far as is possible in such brief compass, they have in it a thoroughly reliable presentation of present-day science with respect to mind cure. THE CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES: ECCLESIASTICUS. By W. O. E. Oesterley, D.D. Cambridge, at the University Press. 6s. net.

THE publication in the Cambridge Bible of commentaries upon the Apocrypha forms an admirable illustration of the growth of interest in these writings, too long neglected by Protestant preachers and teachers. Ecclesiasticus, as the title suggests, was for long regarded as the "Church Book" par excellence, and not without good reason. With the help of Dr. Oesterley's excellent introduction and notes, the average Minister, unacquainted with German, may read intelligently in public and in private one of the most important text books of Jewish morality. Our author, whilst noticing other critical opinions, holds to the traditional date and unity of the book, and explains its lack of sequence by the theory favoured by Prof. Margoliouth that "the book contains the pith of Ben Sira's public lectures, the notes of which were written down at different times." Recent discoveries of portions of a Hebrew text confirmed the evidence of tradition, and the impression which the Greek version itself makes that Ben Sira wrote in Hebrew. Unlike some recent writers on the subject, Dr. Oesterley regards these fragments rescued from the rubbish room of a synagogue at Cairo as preserving only a recension of the original text, and he claims for the Greek and Syriac versions that they are not without independent value as witnesses of the words of the Jewish teacher. The price of the book, as compared with the rest in the series to which it belongs, seems high, but the value of the book to the English student of the Apocrypha can scarcely be overestimated.

AMONG this season's issues in the Lindsey Press will be another volume of verse by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, under the title, "Songs Devout." It will contain many new poems as well as some of his well-known hymns and other pieces.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

II.

NEWTON had proved by many careful experiments, as we learnt last week, that the earth has a wonderful power of drawing things towards it, and what we call the weight of things comes from this pull that the earth is putting forth all the time. He began to reason in this way: If this pull is so very little lessened by our mounting up as high as we can above the earth, so that even from the tops of the highest mountains a thing will seem to fall as quickly as it does if you let it drop from a few feet above the earth, why should not the earth still be putting forth this power on things much further from it than those on the tops of mountains? Why should it not reach as far as the moon? To find out if this really were so, he began to calculate that, if a thing takes a second to fall from a height of 16 ft. above the earth, it will only fall a quarter of that distance, viz., 4 ft., in a second when it is removed to a height which is double the circumference of the earth, because at that height the pull of the earth will be only a quarter as strong.

Then he went on to calculate that, at a distance sixty times as great as the circumference of the earth, the same thing would fall one-twentieth of an inch in a second. Next—and think how exciting this must have been to him!—he found, by studying through his telescope the path or orbit of the moon round the earth, and by reading what other astronomers had said about it, that the moon does actually fall towards our earth just that very distance, one-twentieth of an inch, in a second. So, from watching the apple fall off the tree, he had been led to make a very great discovery—a discovery that made it for the first time possible to understand how it is that the sun, moon, earth and stars go on moving in the same regular paths, and do not, as you know trains sometimes do, rush into each other and destroy one another. This law, which he had proved when he showed that the moon falls one-twentieth of an inch towards the earth in a second, governs the sun and all the stars in the same way. They each are pulled towards each other, as if by an invisible string, and pulled away from each other by some star or planet in another part of the heavens, and in this way all the planets, of which our earth is one, are pulled towards the sun and kept moving round it, while at the same time they are pulled away from it by the other planets near them and by stars in other parts of the universe, and so they keep circling round in an even path, and do not jostle each other or come too close to the sun, which would burn them up if they did, and the sun itself is kept in its place by this same great law, which is called the law of gravitation.

Gravitation comes from a Latin word meaning “weight,” and it is applied to this law because it is the reason that things have weight at all. Nothing would have any weight if it were not for this power of attraction which one thing has for another. Why they have this power cannot be explained, unless perhaps an even greater man than Newton should some day be born; all we know, thanks to Newton, is that they have it, and that by it the sun, moon, earth and stars are made to keep an orderly, quiet, and regular path from one year's end to another. All these wonderful movements had been going on for millions of years before Newton was born, and will go on for millions of years after you and I and everybody we know are no longer living on earth. Is it not wonderful that the brain of one man should have made such a discovery—the discovery of a law so marvellous that only God could have invented it? and then to think that boy was once going to school and being scolded if he did not know his lessons, and coming back to his supper, and perhaps being sent out to drive the cows home before he went to bed. But that boy had brains, and he used them as he knew God meant him to do, and now he is famous all over the world, and everyone born into the world since Newton's time understands far better than those who came before him could do, how wonderfully this great universe is governed and planned.

Newton had always been a religious man, but this discovery made him more so than ever, for he saw by it that God's greatness and wisdom were even more marvellous than he had known. As soon as he was sure that the law of gravitation was true, he began to write a book about it which was published in 1687. This book, called the “Principia,” or “Principles,” is one of the most famous in the world, and it made Newton very celebrated, though he was still far from being an old man—only 45. Learned men in other countries saw that it was a great book, and they wrote to Newton to tell him so, and to ask him questions about anything which they did not understand, and in this way he came to know most of the cleverest men then living. He was made President of the Royal Society—a Society which had lately been started for studying Nature—and this was a great honour, for only a very learned man was fit for it. It might have made some men vain to be thought so much of, but Newton was too great to be vain. He saw how little we could know compared with all there is to be known about the universe we live in, and he once said to a friend that he “felt like a child picking up pebbles on the shore.” He saw there was a great sea of knowledge which he had not crossed, and he was so humble-minded that he always said that what he did know had been arrived at by hard work and perseverance more than by any uncommon cleverness in himself.

He never talked of himself or of other people, and he never thought that because he was such a great and clever man there was no need to trouble himself with any of the small and common things of life which came in his way. His temper was wonderfully gentle, and he always controlled himself when he was inclined to be angry. There is a story told about him which you may have heard. He had a little dog called Diamond, which he was very fond of, and one day when he came into the room where he had been writing, he found that Diamond had upset a lighted candle among his papers, and that a number of them were burnt. You can think how vexing it must have been to him to lose papers that he had spent years in writing, and many people would have rushed at the dog and given it a good beating. Yet all that Newton said was, “Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief that thou hast done.” As he was always thinking over hard questions, he sometimes forgot what was going on round him, and there are amusing stories told about this—how he would now and then spend hours in dressing in the morning, for if something came into his mind as he was getting up, he would sit on the edge of his bed and forget all about his dressing until the question, whatever it was, had become clear to him. One morning a friend came to see him and was asked to stay to dinner. Newton was not up yet, and was so long in dressing that the friend grew hungry, and ate up the whole of a fowl that was on the table. When Newton at last came in, he lifted up the cover which was over the fowl, and seeing only the bones there, he said, “I thought I had not dined yet.”

In 1797 Newton was made Master of the Mint, in London, where all the money is coined. He thought it right to attend strictly to his business there, and so he did not spend as much time over his studies as formerly. But he still did more in that way than most people can do, and he had a great many clever friends whom he went to see, and who came to see him. Everyone was glad to know him, and you cannot wonder when you remember how polite and kind and gentle he was, as well as clever. Look what a beautiful face he has in his portrait, and think if you would not have liked to have known him yourself. The Princess of Wales, daughter of George I., said that “She thought herself happy in coming into the world at a time which put it into her power to converse with Sir Isaac Newton.” And when we read what the great men of his time thought of him we see that they all loved and admired him. This shows that he was not only clever, but had a beautiful character too. It is possible to be very clever and yet very disagreeable to other people. Newton was as noble in his heart as in his head, and this makes him very great indeed. It was shown in his last illness, when he was in great pain, yet he was always patient and gentle, and the moment the pain was a little better he would talk to his friends and smile as if nothing were the matter. He died when he was 85, and there are not many people who have lived through the reigns of six Kings and Queens as he did. Can you tell me what reigns they were? First, there was Charles I.; he was beheaded, as you know, in 1649. Then came Cromwell, and after him his son Richard Cromwell. We will not count either of them as Kings, for they only called themselves Lord Protectors. Then came Charles II. (who started the Royal Society, which I have told you of), then

James II., then William and Mary, then Queen Anne, and lastly George I. Newton was greater than any of these Kings and Queens, for though they could give laws to the people of England, they were not able, like Newton, to find out the laws of God, which are far, far greater than any other laws, because they "shall not be broken."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

SOUTH AFRICAN NOTES.

EVERY civilised country in the world has its own special difficulties and controversies in regard to religious education in schools. It can hardly be otherwise, seeing that religion is so closely bound up with education and the development of character. Our difficulties arise, in the main, from two causes. First, the large majority of parents are unable or unwilling to give religious education to their own children in the home. Second, religion being largely a matter of temperament and the development of the inward spirit, each child needs separate study and individual attention, whereas, in the schools, the teacher has to deal with children in the mass.

Here, in the Cape Province, the controversy arose in this way. Parliament has hitherto left the question of religious instruction to be dealt with by the local school committees. These, finding the question a difficult and thorny one, left it, in most cases, severely alone, beyond providing here and there for right of entry, or the opening of school with Scripture reading and prayer. Then the usual cry arose that the education in the schools was too formal, mechanical, and intellectual, and neglected the moral and spiritual nature of the child. Whereupon a committee of ministers, representing the Dutch Reformed, the Anglican, the Wesleyan, the Presbyterian, and the Lutheran Churches, met in conference a little while ago to draw up a Catechism, and a syllabus of Scripture lessons evidently designed to bolster up the particular beliefs included in the Catechism. The Catechism is a sort of G.C.M. of the theological dogmas taught in the Churches represented at the conference. It is to be pumped into the children in the usual formal and mechanical way, without note or comment—this is called religious education! Could anything be more inept?

The Catechism begins with the Apostles' Creed; then follows a crude statement of the doctrine of the Trinity, the orthodox doctrine of the birth and mission of Christ, the meaning of Faith, Sin, and Salvation, and insistence upon the two sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper as means of grace, concluding with the Ten Commandments. But the most surprising parts of the Catechism are a limitation of salvation and a narrow definition of the "Church of God," which one could scarcely believe would emanate from a body of educated Christian men in the twentieth century. Question 7 runs as follows:—

"Is there any other Saviour than Jesus Christ?"

Answer.—"No; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved than the name of Jesus."

And question 14 runs:

"What is the Church of God?"

Answer.—"The Church of God is the whole body and brotherhood of Christian people of all countries and all times, united by the Holy Spirit to the one Head, the Lord Jesus Christ."

This means that the Jews and the followers of all the great non-Christian religions, that is, the major part of the human race, are excluded from the possibility of salvation, and regarded as outcasts from the Church of God. And this in the twentieth century! The teachers' associations, Dutch and English, have accepted the Catechism by a considerable majority, and the Provincial Council has requested its Executive Committee to arrange for the introduction into the curriculum of a system of religious instruction which shall embrace the Catechism. The only hopeful feature in the situation from the liberal point of view is that the Education Commission, of which Mr. Fremantle was chairman, and which recently presented a very valuable report, recommends the introduction of a system of "Christian Ethics," into the schools as part of a system of religious instruction. This will give the educational authorities the opportunity of framing a system of practical ethical teaching, which, it is to be hoped, will find more favour with both teachers and scholars than a dry-as-dust sectarian catechism which is entirely above the heads of the children, and which, as the teachers will ultimately find, will certainly be used as a theological test against themselves. The whole controversy shows how far we lag behind the best thought, both in theology and in educational theory, when we come to the practical teaching of religion in our educational system. "Children's religious conceptions," says Professor Stanley Hall in his great work on "Adolescence," "should not be systematised or stereotyped, or growth will be checked. The Bible for childhood should be pure literature with no trace of dogma. . . The havoc that dogma has wrought in the religious nature and nurture of the young by regarding the Bible as a text-book of theology rather than a guide to life, as itself literally inspired rather than the most inspiring of books, is none the less disastrous because well-meant. The very idea of orthodoxy of belief in this field, or of formulated creed, is ominous for youth." And again: "It should be written over the door of every institution for higher religious education, 'Let no one enter here who does not know psychology.' In the name of youth I postulate and await without a shadow of doubt or fear (1) broader conceptions of the human soul, that faith, the greatest of all its faculties, be rescued from present neglect and degeneration; (2) loftier ideas of Scripture that shall make it, not a fetish, but the true and living logos of the human heart and will, never finished and complete in the past, but a never-ending progressive revelation of which the prophets and Jesus gave us only the beginning; and (3) eternal warfare upon orthodoxies and all dogmatic finalities, which are only the petrifications of faith." When, I wonder, will our educational authorities realise such an ideal in our school-teaching.

The Defence Bill which was passed by Parliament last session aroused comparatively little interest throughout the country. One or two meetings of protest were held, but there was no organised opposition. The provisions of the Bill are less drastic than those of the Defence Act of Australia. The Cadet system and military training are to be introduced into the schools, but parents who have conscientious objections may withdraw their children from such training. The Minister for Defence considers that only one-half the white male population is needed for an effective Defence force, and he proposes, in the first instance, to get this half by calling for volunteers. If the necessary number does not come forward, then the Government is empowered to order a ballot of the remainder—between the ages of 17 and 21—and those who are balloted for service will be compelled to undergo about three weeks military training each year, for four years. There is a proviso, however, that the members of any sect which has a religious objection to military service will be exempt from the ballot. This seems designed to meet the scruples of the members of the Society of Friends, the Tolstoians, and possibly the Seventh Day Adventists.

Some detailed census returns have lately been sent to the Press, but they are not yet accessible apparently to the general public. The Cape Times publishes a brief summary. There is a slight but unexpected increase in polygamy amongst the native races in the Cape Province. In 1904 there were 120 wives to every 100 husbands; in 1911 there were 125 wives to every 100 husbands. Throughout the Union there are 607,762 native males married. Of these 516,607 are monogamous, 69,048 have two wives, 14,538 have three wives, lesser numbers have four, five, six, and seven wives, and one young barbarian in the Transvaal boasts 46 wives. One wonders how he survives! With regard to illiteracy, something like 75 in every hundred of the population are unable to read or write. This widespread illiteracy is, of course, due to the large native population, of whom over four millions are outside the radius of our educational system. The percentage of white illiterates above the age of 10 is 2·3 only, a percentage which compares very favourably with most European countries. But the fact that 85 in every hundred non-Europeans in the Cape Province are unable to read or write will give some impression of the immensity of the task which lies before us even in this one direction.

Mr. Sharpe writes with "temperate hopefulness" of the Liberal movement in Johannesburg. The cause, he says, has taken firm root there. But the growth will be slow, as there is little idealism in the town. Still, there is an increased public spirit, manifested in a widespread desire for the best educational facilities, and for the realisation of a higher ideal of municipal life. There are many educated people in Johannesburg—more, perhaps, than in the ordinary manufacturing or mining town—but they are largely agnostic, materialistic, or indifferent. This makes the work extremely arduous and difficult. Mr. Sharpe writes in very high terms of the devoted and self-sacrificing labours of the Church committee and Church helpers generally. He is anxious to build a Church or Hall so that the movement may have a permanent home.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AT MANSFIELD.

ABOUT fifty delegates from Nottingham, Derbyshire, Lincoln, Leicestershire, Rutland and Northants attended the annual meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, held at the Old Meeting House, Mansfield, on Tuesday, October 15. Public worship was conducted in the morning by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. G. Evans, of Dukinfield.

Alderman Royce, of Leicester, who has been an active and efficient president for the last three years, and has taken much interest in the smaller churches and lay preachers' union, presided at the business meeting in the afternoon. Mr. J. T. Perry, of Nottingham, was elected president, on the motion of Mr. J. W. White (Mansfield), seconded by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins. Mr. W. Godfrey moved the acceptance with regret of the resignation of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, secretary of the Association, who is leaving Mansfield for Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, near Manchester. This was seconded by Mr. W. Moss (Loughborough), and carried. The Rev. T. Jenkins (Hinckley) was elected secretary.

It was decided to hold the next annual meetings at Derby.

The annual report was given by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, and the reports of the various churches in the Association's district, showing the progress that had been made, were also presented. A resolution extending a hearty welcome to the Revs. W. E. George and E. Lockett and Miss H. Phillips on their settlement was passed.

SOCIAL SELF-SACRIFICE.

In the evening a conference was held under the chairmanship of the new president, and Mr. E. A. Smith, B.Sc., of the Nottingham University College, and lecturer to the Workers' Educational Association, gave an address on "Social Self-Sacrifice." His position, he said, brought him into touch with the workers, and he could tell them that the present social unrest was more deep-seated than many people realised. There was reason for the deep-seated dissatisfaction which one came into contact with on all hands, and comfortable people were not easy in their minds about it. The workers to-day were anxious to take advantage of educational opportunities, and the efforts being made to equip themselves with the knowledge and the training which was now necessary were bound in the long run to result in a different and he thought a better distribution of the world's good things. Christianity demanded that we should seek to extend these aspirations and efforts, and to help them in a spirit of love, brotherliness, and Christian self-sacrifice. Mr. Smith suggested that the person who carelessly and thoughtlessly repeated uncharitable and untrue things about working men and labour problems was somewhat lacking in the Christian ideal of humility and charity. The man who was ready to denounce politics in the pulpit he also criticised, remarking that many of their ministers felt it their duty to try and strike the Christian note in regard to these things. Very frequently the people who did these things were in many ways the salt of the earth in their private lives. He suggested that Christian men should give serious thought to these things, remarking that the study of such questions was not so noticeable as the cultivation of social amenities.

A discussion followed, in which the Revs. A. G. Peaston, E. I. Fripp, and others took part.

THE members of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, Calcutta, very generously forwarded to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, London, a donation of £7, to the Fund for the relief of families who had suffered through the wreck of the Titanic. The money was paid over to the Lord Mayor's Fund. This expression of sympathy and goodwill from Theists in India has been very highly appreciated.

HIBBERT TRUST.

ONE SCHOLARSHIP on this foundation, of the value of £120, tenable for One Year, will be awarded in December next, provided that a Candidate of sufficient merit presents himself. Candidates are required solemnly to declare in writing that it is their intention to exercise the office of Minister of Religion amongst those who profess Christianity in its most simple and intelligible form, and who do not require for themselves or their ministers subscription to any doctrinal articles of belief. They must also furnish satisfactory evidence of age, graduation, &c., in accordance with the regulations, which may be obtained from the Secretary of the Trust.

Names and addresses of candidates should be in the hands of the Secretary by November 1st, and the required declaration, certificates, testimonials and all other information must be in the hands of the Secretary not later than Wednesday, November 6th.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE UNITED SERVICE will be held in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, E.C., on Sunday, October 20, at 7 o'clock. Preacher, Rev. W. G. TARRANT, B.A. All are heartily welcome.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Aberdeen.—Some correspondence has recently appeared in the Aberdeen newspapers as a result of some addresses given by the Rev. Lucking Tavenor on the pictures of G. F. Watts in a Presbyterian Church. This proceeding has apparently been objected to in certain quarters, and the Presbyterians are accused of "lowering the flag." Mr. Tavenor has vigorously responded to this criticism, and has been defended by other correspondents.

Blackpool.—On Friday evening, October 11, Miss Brooke Herford gave an address in the North Shore schoolroom to a joint gathering of the ladies of the North Shore and Lytham-road congregations on the work of the Unitarian Women's League, with the result that a branch is to be formed at each church. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith presided.

Brighton.—Mr. and Mrs. Wilton, highly esteemed teachers in connection with the Free Christian Church Sunday School, have been presented with a token of affection and respect from the members of the school on the occasion of their marriage.

Cambridge.—Mr. E. R. Rathbone writes from Trinity College, Cambridge, as follows:—"Unitarian services will be held this term at the Liberal Club, Downing-street, on Sundays at 11.30. Those Unitarians wishing to join the Cambridge Unitarian Society may obtain full particulars from Mr. Lummis, the minister, or from me, the secretary, Trinity College. We earnestly hope that all Unitarian Freshmen will take advantage of these services, as they depend for support almost entirely on the students."

Hindley.—The foundation stones of the Sunday school extension were laid on Saturday, the 12th inst., by Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., of Warrington, and Mr. Councillor Abraham Hurst, of Hindley, the oldest member of the congregation, and for over fifty years a trustee of the chapel. Mr. Isaac Barrow presided over the afternoon meeting, which was addressed by the Rev. J. J. Wright, on behalf of the Sunday School Association, and the Rev. Dendy Agate. In the evening a meeting was held in the chapel, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. Dr. S. A. Mellor, H. D. Roberts, W. Whitaker, W. Upright (Primitive Methodist minister), and the minister, the Rev. W. F. Turland. The extensions adjoin the present schools, and comprise a large central hall, with seating accommodation for upwards of 400, two class-rooms on the ground floor and one on the first floor, with the usual accommodation for heating and storage in the basement. The estimated total cost of the buildings and furnishing is £2,000. The donations and collections for the day amounted to over £60.

Horwich.—Miss Helen Brooke-Herford met the ladies of the congregation on October 10, to explain the aims and objects of the Women's League. It was unanimously decided to form a branch, and a good number of members have been enrolled.

Hull.—Through the death of Mr. Wilkinson, which was announced last week, the Park-street Church has lost one of its oldest and most valued members. Although he was unable to attend the church for some years before he died, he nevertheless maintained his enthusiasm for the cause to the very last. His recent generous gift of £500 to the Church Extension Fund encouraged the congregation to proceed at once with the scheme, and the buildings are now in course of erection at the back of the church. It is a matter for deep regret that he did not live to see the completion of a scheme in which he took so deep and practical an interest.

London: Essex Church.—At their first meeting after the summer, the Committee passed the following resolution:—"That the Committee desire to record their deep sense of the loss which Essex Church has sustained by the death of Mr. James Beale, who, as a member of the Committee for twenty-four years, during ten of which he acted as chairman, showed so keen and prolonged an interest in the welfare of the church. And they desire to express their most sincere sympathy with Mrs. Beale and her family in their bereavement." They also passed a resolution of thanks to Miss Violet Preston, for carrying out the embroidery of a frontal for the Communion table. The design for this was prepared by Mr. Henry Holiday, and consists of a running border of foliage and flowers harmonising with the prevailing colours of the mosaic panels above; it has been beautifully executed by Miss Preston, and completes the scheme of decoration for the chancel.

London: Finchley.—A course of six lectures will be given at Granville Hall, North Finchley, on Wednesdays at 8 p.m., as follows:—October 23, "The Poetry of the Eighteenth Century," Dr. Blake Odgers; October 30, "Samuel Johnson and his Friends," Dr. Blake Odgers; November 6, "Charles Lamb," Dr. Blake Odgers; November 13, "Wordsworth," the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed; November 20, "Tennyson," Dr. Clement Gatley; and November 27, "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came," by Robert Browning, Dr. Blake Odgers. For further particulars see advertisement.

London: Islington.—It is announced that special services have been arranged in connection with the jubilee celebrations at Unity Church on October 27. The preacher in the morning will be Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, and in the evening the Rev. E. Savell Hicks. A public meeting will be held in the schoolroom on Monday evening, October 28, at 8 o'clock.

London: Peckham.—The Rev. D. W. Robson and his wife have received a warm welcome at a congregational meeting, when they were presented with a handsome timepiece and a purse of money as wedding gifts. The presentation was made on behalf of the congregation by the hon. secretary, Mr. W. J. Cooley.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Wednesday evening, October 9, a congregational meeting was held in the Gaskell Hall to welcome the Rev. B. C. Constable, formerly of Stockport, as minister. The chair was taken by Mr. W. H. Jones, chairman of the Church Committee, who was supported by the Revs. B. C. Constable, H. E. Dowson, W. Harrison, A. Cunliffe Fox, S. H. Mellone, H. McLachlan, J. H. Morton, E. L. H. Thomas, A. Thornhill, W. Whitaker, Mr. John Heys, Mr. R. T. Heys (of Stockport), Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. J. Wigley, and the students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. Mr. John Heys, one of the founders of the church, gave a hearty welcome to Mr. Constable on behalf of the church and Sunday school; and speeches were made by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, Mr. R. T. Heys, the Rev. A. C. Fox, Mr. J. Wigley, Dr. Mellone, the Rev. J. H. Morton (Roby Congregational Church), and Mr. G. H. Leigh. The Rev. B. C. Constable responded in suitable terms.

Nantwich.—Two concerts in aid of the Restoration Fund of the Presbyterian Chapel will be given by the boys of Willaston School, assisted by members of the staff, on Wednesday afternoon, October 30, and Thursday evening, October 31. The programme will include several compositions by Mr. H. Lang Jones, the headmaster.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—An evening concert in aid of the funds of the Association will be given at Essex Hall on Saturday, October 26, as announced in our advertisement columns, commencing at 7.30. The artistes will include Miss Barbour, L.R.A.M., Miss A. Withall, and Miss V. Withall, L.R.A.M., Mr. G. V. Carter, and others.

Northumberland and Durham Lay Preachers' Union.—The monthly meeting was held at Newcastle on Monday last, October 14. The service was conducted in the Church of the Divine Unity by Mr. F. T. Clarke, and the sermon was preached by Miss Hands. The service is now made open to visitors, and it is hoped in this way to have a week-night service monthly. At the class afterwards, which was presided over by the Rev. Alfred Hall, it was resolved to affiliate with the National Lay Preachers' Union. It was also decided to form a Lay Preachers' Class for Theological Study.

Sheffield.—The annual united service of the district congregations was held in Channing Hall on Thursday, 10th inst., many representatives being present from Upper Chapel, Uppertorpe, Attercliffe, Rotherham, Doncaster, Barnsley, Bolton-on-Deane, and Mexborough. Over 150 sat down to tea. An organ recital was given in the chapel by Mr. Arnold Bagshaw. At the evening meeting the hall was crowded. Mr. W. R. Stevenson (Uppertorpe) presided. Brief addresses were given by Mr. H. R. Bramley, M.A. (Upper Chapel), Mr. W. Lount (Bolton), Dr. Ram (Mexborough), the Rev. Thos. Anderson (district minister), the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., Mrs. W. Laycock (Women's League), Mr. J. Vaughan (Doncaster), Mr. A. Brooke (Barnsley), and Mr. H. E. Fishburn (Attercliffe). An attractive programme of music was rendered by Uppertorpe friends, viz., Mrs. A. King, Miss Marion Dolphin, Miss F. Leesley, and Messrs. C. H. Dolphin and W. King. The proceedings were characterised by much enthusiasm, as the reports, especially from

The history of the Congregation as a definite movement goes back to 1872, when King Charles II. made the Declaration of Indulgence, and a Meeting-house was built in Blackfriargate. But the roots of the history go down into the stormy times of the Commonwealth, and the book begins with the firm stand taken by the Vicar, William Styles, at the period of the sieges of Hull by the Royalists.

The gradual evolution of this ancient society, which is remarkable as never having adopted any creed or doctrinal subscription, has not hitherto been traced.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

NARROWNESS OF MIND.

Professor T. M. Kettle contributed a lively article with the refreshing title "The Importance of Being Narrow-Minded" to Public Opinion last week. In it he declares that "the attempt of any individual mind to come to terms with the modern world as a whole is like an attempt to decant the Atlantic into a thimble." Professor Kettle has some comforting things to say to the man who is conscious of a feeling of depression and ineffectiveness in face of the multitudinous activities and problems of our time, but he can scarcely be said to defend narrow-mindedness because he tries to make people contented with their limitations. It is simply his way of reminding them that they cannot attend to too many things at once. After all, he says, "why be angry at the narrowness of our compass, seeing that we have all eternity in which progressively to widen it? It braces the curious mind—and what is mind but curiosity?—to realise that, because of the inexhaustibility of knowledge, we are saved from all menace of tedium; that a new adventure awaits us behind every blade of grass; and that, released at last from the fetters of time and space, but not from those of individuality, our finitude will have scope to follow the old trail of infinity in an endless asymptote."

INFANT MORTALITY AT TOTTENHAM.

We learn from the Daily Citizen that a School for Mothers has been opened at Tottenham, where the high infantile mortality in the St. Ann's Ward of the district—last year it was 160.1 per 1,000 births, as compared with 80.5 in the Harringay Ward—has caused the local health authority considerable anxiety for some time. A private association has been formed, with Dr. Sophia Seekings, the Acting Medical Officer of Health for the district, and two assistants, both lady inspectors of nuisances, at its head. A house has been rented and equipped with the aid of the Women's Imperial Health Association, and local residents, and already there is a large number of "scholars." Mothers are instructed in the proper care of their children, advised as to the best methods of feeding them, and shown how to make serviceable articles out of old material. There seems to be a real desire for instruction on the part of those whom it is intended to teach, and high hopes are entertained by the staff of the success of the venture.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE news from the Balkans is confusing, and probably few people have any clear view of the military operations in their minds. There have been fierce fighting and great loss of life in many places, and so far success seems to be on the side of the Allies. Sympathy here, so far as it has found articulate expression, is with them in their struggle; partly because honour for the small nation fighting for freedom is still a strong motive, in spite of the growth of a more grandiose imperialism; and partly owing to the conviction, which we believe to be well grounded, that Turkey is incapable of governing a Christian population with justice or humanity.

* * *

THE only method of help which is open to us is to mitigate the suffering in this ghastly struggle by supporting the efforts to succour the wounded. Here there is no question of taking sides. The Red Cross is a symbol which includes men of every kindred and tongue, and treats no one as an alien. Work of this kind also helps to keep us alert to the horror of what is going on around us. The sickening details of fighting soon lose some of their poignancy, and the flaming headlines of the newspapers, while they incite us for the moment, act as a narcotic to our deeper sensibilities. "Turks mowed down," the placards were shouting at men and women as they hurried homewards the other night. We ought not to be able to hear the words without a shiver of pain and a vision of tortured bodies and desolate homes; for that is the dread meaning of war to the common people, whatever high significance it may possess for professional politics.

LORD ROBERTS made a speech in Manchester on Tuesday in support of the objects of the National Service League, in which he revealed in the most glaring way the danger of the intrusion of the soldier into politics. "War," he said, "will take place the instant the German forces by land and sea are, by their superiority at every point, as certain of victory as anything in human calculation can be made certain." To these words he added the following illuminating comment: "It is an excellent policy. It is, or should be, the policy of every nation prepared to play a great part in history." We are glad to see that a strong protest against these words has been issued already by members of Parliament. We are certain that a great mass of ordinary citizens will desire to associate themselves with them in their stern repudiation of this blood and thunder theory of history, with its mischievous appeal to the most degraded instincts of mankind. It is perhaps natural that Lord Roberts, in his old age, should be obsessed by the memories of his campaigns, and be incapable of thinking except in military metaphors; but it is not in this way that an enlightened Christian patriotism measures greatness.

ALL SAINTS' DAY is one of the traditional festivals which it is easy to turn to modern uses. It has in it the perspective of a living tradition, which helps to conserve for us the moral values of Christian experience, and to fix our eyes upon the loftiest standards of spiritual attainment. It has been a misfortune for English Christianity that its calendar of saints is so meagre and belongs only to the distant past. The intellectual rivalries of the sects, which followed in the wake of the Reformation, destroyed the unifying power of common admirations, and made canonisation by the popular will almost impossible. But our growing sense of the deeper unities of the spirit, and the confession that genuine religious fellowship is based more upon what we reverence and admire than upon what we think, should help us to recover our feeling for saintliness and its inexhaustible treasuries of love and holiness.

THE Manchester City League of Help held its annual meeting on Tuesday. The report, which was marked by a tone of buoyant hopefulness, reveals the large amount of social activity which is open to associations of this kind. It is all based, as Professor Chapman pointed out, on the belief that the solution of the problem of distress is not merely a matter of money, and not mainly a matter of legislation, but very largely a matter of personal service. Among other things special attention has been given to the fight against tuberculosis, always an insidious foe in a crowded city like Manchester, and to the evils of insanitary property and overcrowding.

BUT we mark with special pleasure the attitude which has been taken up by the Manchester Guild of Help towards the Insurance Act. Instead of wasting its time in captious criticism it has set itself to the task of helping it to work smoothly and of overcoming the inevitable difficulties. "The important feature of the coming year," it is stated in the report, "will be undoubtedly the coming into force of the Insurance Act. Already numerous questions have arisen, and difficult points have been advised upon, and there is every reason to believe that the Act will provide a steady stream of work for the district committees, just as the Old-age Pension Act and the subsequent amendment have provided work in the past. In all the difficulties that will necessarily arise on the introduction of a new measure of such magnitude and in all the adaptation of existing resources to the changed conditions, the League will find wide scope and usefulness. But this additional work will to some extent be balanced by the financial security in times of sickness, which will enable district committees to devote the time at present spent in obtaining relief to other purposes."

 Next week we shall publish a special article by Canon Lilley on the Autobiography and Life of Father Tyrrell.*

GREAT DAYS.

THOUGH time, in its flowing, admits no pause, knows nothing of limited periods or division, yet, to us, the days are real intervals of time—space, defined by the sun—little epochs of duration charged with vital significance, offering the ever-fresh occasions for adventure and surprise. And sometimes we are permitted, or persuaded from within, to accept the day in all its wealth of opportunity, and for all it may mean to us of enchantment or romance. We wake at dawn and are lifted as on a wave of expectancy, filled with a sense of the wonderfulness of life and of the immense possibilities which the new day holds in leash, waiting to be let loose for the soul's realisation or achievement. And this wave, by its sustained impulse of feeling, carries us through the succeeding hours, unwearied and unrestrained, till, at night, it lays us to rest again, on the shores of dream.

On these days of superlative excellence nothing unusual may happen, and no exceptional opportunities of action or enjoyment or endurance offer themselves; the external world and its folk behave much as on other days. But the intelligence being more alert, the will and the affections more responsive and the senses more swiftly aware of things, all the common interests and affairs become charged with more subtle meanings; the familiar human presences seem clad in a purer, perhaps almost ethereal, light; the earth and sky take on some new and more vivid enchantment, and the homely sounds, of nature or the human voice, have a music in them we heard not yesterday, perchance have never heard before.

An Autumn day, placid and uneventful, will sometimes foster most propitiously, from without, the mood of prolonged and passionate realisation of life and its abounding possibilities of experience. The sustained impulse of feeling will be, of course, from within. The wave that lifts and carries us forward through the hours must be of the soul itself, though largely, perhaps, of the sub-conscious self, which floods the more ordinary consciousness, uprising from the depths of our spiritual being. But the temper of the outside world, even the temperature of the surrounding air, the tones and tints of the broad earth and the encircling heavens, account for much. And a serene autumn day seems to invite or stimulate the mind to finest effort, or to fullest receptivity. It is not too long, from dawn to sunset, for keen, persistent intensity of interest; all the hours of daylight may find us fully awake. The first rays of morning allure from sleep and call us out, before the mists have vanished, and while the dew hangs cold on the grass and withering leaves; the chill, moist air, as we come forth into the open, prevails on us to take deep breaths of its invigorating life; it fills the lungs and quickens the pulse; its cool, invisible ocean flows about us, while the glow in the east brightens and softly diffuses warmth over the earth and its creatures that love the sun. On such a day, with the inner self alive to all its promises of excelling virtue, one's steps keep pace with the sun, the mind reflects and etherealises the wonder and the affluence of the world; and when the light fades and the stars flash out from the depths of space, body and soul are so replenished by the intense energies of the day, that one seems to have stored up a new wealth of vitality such as many following days will not exhaust.

Musing at night, before sleep buries for a while, in soft forgetfulness, all we have lived through or accomplished during the propitious hours, we perceive that our little world of vision and achievement has been for us an enchanted place. On the faces of men and women a magic light has glowed; children at their play, or greeting us by the wayside, have recalled memories of fairy folk we knew in our own childhood's days. Touches of autumn colour on trees and hedgerows have reminded us, not only that decay is beautiful, but that Nature demands reaction and repose for her children, to the end that, a few months hence, she may arouse them to new life, for the freshness and glory of spring. Our work, too, we perceive, has been something more than the mere doing of things; the enforced, inevitable labours, that so often, on ordinary days, are little better than drudgery, were wrought with unwonted ease, while the self-imposed tasks have been as a kind of sport or play. If pain or grief has intruded, the spirit of endurance without depression has not failed us. The wrongs of the world—the folly of man's vain ambitions and desires, the brutal injustice that prevails so long, the tragedy of the disinherited, the stupid comedy of the idle rich—all the grim social problems which these things create may have loomed on the mind's horizon, as on other days; but the promise or presage of their solution has shone for us in a clearer, holier light. If THOREAU's exultant question has occurred to us—"Would the face of Nature be so sublime and beautiful were man's destiny not equally so?"—the answer has followed swift and sure.

The mystery of these rare, translucent days were not easy to penetrate, probe we never so curiously. "The wind bloweth where it listeth." The power, as hinted above, may lie with those tides of the subliminal consciousness which rise and overflow the threshold of ordinary feeling and insight. But for the most part it may content us to exclaim with EMERSON: "Give me health and a day, and I will make the pomp of Emperors ridiculous." Health—haleness, holiness, a vigorous sanity of mind and body, harmony of the inner and outer man, of the whole man and the great life of the All—this, and "a day," can give into our hands, into our hearts, a wealth of beauty and surprised delight before which the pride of circumstance and possession and luxurious power shall seem too poor for all but pity, too trivial for all but solicitude and pained regret. And at the close of one of these radiant time-spaces of the sun it may please us to reflect that we have obeyed the exhortation of the Son of SIRACH, "Defraud not thyself of a good day."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THIRTY YEARS AFTER THE EJECTMENT.

Some Notes on Nonconformists, 1690-92.

AFTER spending a few hours with an ancient record kept among the archives of the Presbyterian Board, I think it likely that many readers at this time of commemoration of the Ejected of 1662 will be interested in a few notes. The document consists of Lists prepared (as appears from internal evidence) in the years 1690-92. As is well known, the Presbyterian and Independent—or, as they are here styled, "Congregational"—Nonconformists availed themselves of the liberty given them under the Act of Toleration, 1689, to draw together for mutual support and to organise their forces. The union between them was but short-lived; the record before me shows in brief what was done by the co-operating parties in the direction of ascertaining the condition of the congregations and ministers at that time. With the exception of those London ministers who were settled with congregations, there are lists giving apparently all the names of Nonconformist ministers in England and Wales known to the organisers. These lists were compiled, it is clear, from evidence supplied in the various counties, mostly (I think) by the ministers themselves; and particulars are given as to the success and support of the congregations and ministers, as well as to prospects of extended efforts. With regard to some counties the entries are meagre; in other cases they are full, if not complete.

The lists are now fastened into a sort of ledger of 49 leaves, with one half-cover of brownish (or it may be simply dirty) paper remaining. The edges are very worn, and occasionally the writing suffers; but on the whole the document is well-preserved and quite legible, a little shorthand excepted. The first two pages of manuscript give a list of "Ministers ^{y^t} are not fixed to particular Congregations" for "London and in and about y^e same," sixty in number; the names of thirteen "youths" are added, as available for the ministry. The rest of the book is made of county lists, arranged on the following plan. On the left hand page we have sections devoted to (a) "Ministers that have a competent supply" (i.e., maintenance); (b) "Ministers that may want a supply"; (c) "Persons contributing." On the right hand the sections run, (d) "Places that have had and where there may be opportunity of Religious Assemblies"; (e) "Persons Qualified for the Ministry, and not yet Fixed"; (f) "Persons Qualifying for the Ministry"; and (g) "Proposals." At the head of the right-hand margin on each page there is inserted one name or more, apparently of members of the organising Board who were responsible for collecting the reports for that particular list. Among them are names well-known in Nonconformist annals, including Dr. Bates, Alsop, Mead, and "Mr. Dan. Williams." There are twenty-four altogether. Evidently notes have been added in many places after the original entries, and references are given to ampler statements of the "cases" in documents numbered to nearly two hundred, and referred to by figure only, the date being sometimes added. Some of the added notes are for 1691; the year 1692 is also mentioned, but no later.

Without professing exactness (which, indeed, would be difficult to attain, owing to repetitions and erasures) I count about 400 ministers (exclusive of London) who are considered, by themselves, to have a "competent supply," though the details show how modest their estimates were. Those in need of aid number about 180 (in addition to the sixty London cases); but besides these there are many names given of men ministering, apparently with more or less regularity, in places where the services are, as we should say, of a mission character. These, as well as gospel zeal for further work, will account for the large number of places given under section (d), as I have named it, viz., 160 or so—many being rural places. About 50 "Persons Qualified for the Ministry" in the counties are named. The "Persons Qualifying," including a considerable mention of "Mr. Richard Frankland's Schollars," number about 70—surely a goodly proportion. The most noticeable blank is in the case of "Persons Contributing," while "Proposals" are also few. But it is clear that much of the material available under these heads has been included in the notes and comments attached to other sections.

Of course, the chief "human" interest attaches to these notes and comments, of which I can but reproduce a few here. I venture to think, however, that it would be a thing well worth doing if some public-spirited friend would undertake the cost of republishing the whole document (if leave were given), especially if the Rev. Alexander Gordon could be secured as its editor. I understand that some portions may shortly be published by consent of the Presbyterian Board, but cannot we accomplish the larger thing as a kind of permanent outcome of our recent celebrations?

A characteristic note appears under Gloucestershire. "The ministers of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Gloucestershire," we read, "have of late sett up an association, and if it be desired the minutes of what hath been, and what shall be from time to time transacted among them, will be sent. They have already agreed upon an accommodation between Pres: and Congr: Ministers, and there have been talks of raising a fund among them; but trading soe dead, taxes soe high, and ye poverty of professors soe great, that it greatly discourages."

The Lancashire names are of special interest, here are a few: "Peter Aspinwall, In Warrington Town, has 3 or 400 hearers, requires noe Sallery, has an estate, preaches freely." "Mr. Saml. Angier, Att Toxteth Park, assistant to Mr. Richardson at Liverpoole, has £75 per annum, and an estate"; but the stipend is evidently not for him alone, as we read further on: "Mr. Richardson, Att Liverpoole, 400 hearers, £75 betweene him and Mr. Angier as above." "Mr. Jno. Crompton, Att ye Loe juxta Liverpoole, 2 or 300 hearers, has £14 per annum, some estate by his wife." "Mr. Robert Eaton, hath a Congregation in Prestwich parish, the people not ungrateful and hath an estate." "Mr. Henry Finch, Att Birch Chappell [Platt], where in ye former liberty hee continued 11 years, and is now there, the allowance is considerable, ye charge of his horse will goe a great way in his allowance from the people, yet complains not." "Mr. Henry Newcome, Outed at Manchester, has continued with yt people ever since, and has a Congregation there now." "Mr. Wood, Att Chowbent, was outed there, but gott in againe, and has continued there ever since." "Mr. Whaley, Att Hindley Chappell, a very hopefull usefull man." All the foregoing are in the "competent supply" list; but here is a typical case of the other kind, re-introducing Crompton's name: "Tho: Collins, a young man" [? later ministering at Bridport and Ilminster] "Att Leigh in Little Wooton, is lately come, yet his stay must be short without some aide, and if this meeting fails ye country for 9 or 10 miles long and 5 or 6 miles broad is utterly destitute. Severall of 50 years old, and some on dying beds, have told Mr. Crompton they never heard anything of the Gospell before hee came among them."

The Yorkshire, West Riding, list tells us that "Mr. Heywood, Formerly Att Coley Chappell neere Halifax, hath short of £20, yet wants nothing," and mentions "Mr. Tho. Sharp, whom God hath signally owned at Leeds," and "Mr. Richd. Frankland, at Rathmell, trains up young ministers, aged 60." Sheffield readers will be interested in the following—Gill became assistant to Timothy Jollie there: "Jeremiah Gill, Son to widdow Gill, very poor, has been with Mr. Jollie for some time, a good schollar, has pregnant parts and a choice spirit, has exercised 3 or 4 times to great satisfaction, wants some further supply to compleat his studies, and for bookes." The North Riding list contains, as might be expected, more references to Frankland's tutorial work, and adds that he has "a meeting in his howse" at Craven.

Many are named as having been "outed" or "ejected" in 1662; some of them by the date of the list being "ancient." The provision for the regular ministry being often so slender—£20 to £30 appears frequently as the stipend—no wonder some cases of pitiful destitution occur. A very sad case is that of "Mr. Prig, att Eltam [Kent], who is soe overwhelmed with melancholly yt hee cannot be prevailed with to preach, though to ye smallest number of hearers, and by this is forgotten of many who otherwise might be helpful to him, nor will he make known his wants, though hee had not a morsell to eate. The Lady Mohun, and ye L. Clinton do both recommend him." I think Mr. Prig was not one of the Ejected, but here is a case that shows the extreme misery that came to one of that noble company. "Mr. Grace, At Shenston [Stafford], is blind and indigent, can goe noe where to preach, his condition is very Low, his very bed was seized from under him for his very bread y^t hee has to keep him alive, most of his helpers are dead, his Daughter as helpless as himselfe through poverty, hee is past preaching through age and other infirmities."

Happily, there are many brighter notes. "Gilpin, of Newcastle, has "a meeting howse, very large and always full" and is "well provided for"; and "Perrot, of Maidstone, has "about 700 auditors, £60 per annum." Coventry in the earliest note is credited with maintaining its minister well; but a somewhat mournful record is entered later: "Mr. Showel, ye only minister left in Coventry, since ye death of Dr. Grace [Grew?] and Mr. Bryan, hee is infirm, deafish, and unacceptable to many of the most judicious hearers, very numerous, said to be in all, in ye city and from ye country, 1,500." This, and some other entries, go to show that congregations and ministers had troubles not unlike some occasionally known still. Another kind of trouble at that time was the fiery zeal of the Anabaptists, who evidently introduced startling doctrines, and provoked considerable strife of tongues here and there. We may close these jottings, however, with a reference much more pleasing. At Kingsclere, which is listed under "Southampton"—the geography being now and again different from the modern—we hear "they go to Newbury," and the extended entry says: "5 miles from Newbury, has beene a good meeting, but Mr. Avery sometimes minister there being dead, are destitute. At times ye gifted men of ye Anabaptists preach, but have promised to desist when a Minister is settled there." Good old Anabaptists!

A DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.

THERE are great searchings of heart in evangelical circles. The continual decreases in church membership are too full of significance to be ignored, even by the most zealous champions of the faith. In spite of improved organisation, involving in many cases the lavish expenditure of time and money, the orthodox churches do not maintain their own. The conversation on "the state of the work of God," which is an annual feature at the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, has for many years reflected the prevailing anxiety. The tendency among those who cling to the old paths is towards introspection. They assure us that the fault lies with God's people. They are confident that, with increased devotion and prayer on the part of the Church, a fresh "outpouring of the Spirit" will be witnessed. There are others, however, even in that most conservative assembly, who realise that the cause of the trouble lies much deeper. Their contention is that the masses have forsaken the Church because they do not believe in the message it has to give. And they are probably much nearer the secret. The theory of evolution has much to answer for in this regard; while the Clarion campaign, and the publications of the Rationalist Press Association have exerted an influence which cannot be estimated. It was to combat these tendencies that Dr. Ballard was some years ago appointed by the Conference as a lecturer on Christian evidences, a position which he still holds. His experience has been varied and somewhat unique, and on the matters in question he speaks with a knowledge of the facts almost unequalled. His recent brochure "Does faith need reasons?"* is full of suggestions to friend and foe alike, and should prove instructive to those who have been accustomed to breathe a freer atmosphere than is to be found in the average "free" church.

While pleading for a faith that shall satisfy the intellect, Dr. Ballard again and again reveals the weakness of the position he seeks to defend. His main contention is that Christianity rests on the argument that the New Testament account of Jesus Christ is true. Yet not once does he give the reader any suggestion that in the light of modern research such a statement is a mere begging of the question. It is easy to welcome the fiercest criticism when one is at liberty to classify the critics, according to his own taste. The criticisms that Dr. Ballard accepts as proven are the "sober findings of modern scholarship," but those assailing his main thesis are "the driving cross-currents of modern hypercriticism, which would becloud the general reliability of the Christian records." This attitude is characteristic of many modern theologians. There is generally a limit beyond which they refuse to travel. It is self-evident that much of the phraseology by means of which the evangelical doctrines were presented a quarter of a century ago is out of harmony with the times. The average person no longer revels in hymns such as "There is a fountain filled with blood," nor is he inclined to admit that he is "false and full of sin," although he may be called upon to sing it. Hence men of Dr. Ballard's calibre are not unreasonable in demanding a restatement of the old dogmas in accordance with modern ideas. The doctrines of the reality of the Trinity, the vicarious atonement, the Resurrection, and the existence of an actual heaven and hell are to be brought up to date. How this is to be done is not stated, except that the result is not to be allowed to clash with the proved science of to-day. It would appear that the "liberal" theologians who have attempted the task have not been very successful, for the positions at which they have arrived are referred to as "at the very most a modified Unitarianism." This is somewhat ungracious on Dr. Ballard's part, for elsewhere he pleads for a recognition that the Christian ideal "deserves the commendation of a Martineau rather than the condemnation of a Nietzsche."

It is curious to note throughout the work the despairing tone adopted by Dr. Ballard towards "experience" and intuition. That a church which has laid such stress on the doctrine of the witness of the Spirit should need to be reminded that "if the assurance of faith is to be anything more than superstitious subjectivity it must rest on solid grounds of objective truth," is enough to set one thinking. He, however, returns to the theme again and again. The low average intelligence of the habitual church-goer fills him with the deepest concern. He marvels at the extent to which "ordinary believers are content with tradition and convention as the basis of their faith." He would probably agree with the dictum of the Bishop of Carlisle that "an unenlightened conscience is worse than mischievous, it is deadly." Turning his attention to the attitude of the scientific world towards religion, he is under no illusion. Notwithstanding Bergson, Eucken, and Sir Oliver Lodge, he recognises that the man of science is still largely materialistic in his outlook, a view which will be confirmed by much that was said at the recent meeting of the British Association. The new allies which the churches have discovered in Bergson and Eucken make no appeal to Dr. Ballard, in his official capacity, although he pays a warm tribute to the brilliant originality of the one and the wide scholarship of the other. They do not assist him in his work of restating the evangelical creed, and what they have written he finds inconsistent with "any form of Christianity save that which has overthrown the New Testament."

The admissions of Dr. Ballard are instructive. Unlike many of his contemporaries he does not despair of the future. On the other hand, he rejoices at "the improved ethical tone of this country's life and thought, as compared with times gone by. . . There is more mercy for criminals, more justice for the average worker, and a strongly increasing movement towards a fairer distribution of life's comforts and pleasures amongst the many." But he is not satisfied. The doubt remains whether these human ameliorations are due to Christian ethics or merely to the development of civilised morality. Perhaps it does not much matter. But it is significant that such a development should have taken place, in spite of the growing disregard for the dogmas of the orthodox churches. With regard to the attitude of the "masses" to Christianity, the author maintains that they are not opposed to the human Christ, but that "the Christ of evangelical theology is unknown to them." Such an admission from such a source is invaluable to those who are anxious to free religion from the chains of dogma. Whether a re-statement of the old doctrines will carry conviction remains to be seen. So far as can be judged it is not "the masses" who are attracted by the new theologians. They will not be drawn by metaphysical abstractions or philosophical subtleties.

In the matter of remedies, Dr. Ballard has little that is startling to suggest. He does not spare his fellow-ministers, although he very cleverly allows the onus of criticism to fall upon other shoulders than his own. Thus he quotes with approval a remark of Mr. Forbes Gray, that "the intellectual quality of many of the sermons preached nowadays is an insult to the intelligence of any educated person." This does not always argue a lack of education on the part of the preacher. In many cases he is afraid to speak the truth he knows for fear of offending the conservative section of his audience. So he adopts the line of least resistance, and confines himself to neutral topics which will not raise difficulties. The pace at which an army can advance is regulated by the rearguard. And it is the fear of offending the babes in the churches which too often prevents the preacher from speaking his mind. But the situation must be faced sooner or later, and the author is naturally an advocate of the bolder course. Not only is it incumbent on the minister to speak the truth he knows, but he must from time to time come out of his "coward's castle" and meet the inquirer on his own ground. The open conferences which are recommended will entail more preparation on the part of the preacher, but he will have the satisfaction of knowing that he is only following in the footsteps of the founder of his religion. There is much more which might be quoted did space permit. Indeed, in many respects, it is a book which might well be read and pondered by ministers and church workers of every denomination. Although Dr. Ballard does not go all the way, he is evidently eager that the truth shall prevail. That such a book should ever have been written by a Wesleyan minister would have been a bold prophecy ten years ago. Its appearance should greatly encourage all who are anxious for the triumph of a liberal faith. The rearguard is evidently moving, and one of the many signs of the times is that Dr. Ballard's book should have been issued from the Wesleyan book-room.

JUDY FROM TIMAHOE.

IN days long, long vanished into the Ewigkeit, the occasional visits of Judy to a certain remote home in the Irish midlands were regarded as happenings of pleasurable importance. Daily life there was of almost incredible monotony, and this may partly account for the welcoming shout that would hail the appearance of Judy in her donkey-cart; an equipage so slow of pace that it has been described as "next door to a wheel-barra."

Yes, perhaps it was that her advent, meant an immediate break in whatever you happened to be doing then, generally lessons; Judy is inseparably connected in one's mind's eye with the relief of hastily relinquished books and slates. For Judy was a cripple; hence the donkey-cart. She was wont to apologise for her helplessness ness by explaining that she "had no power of her legs ever since the day Barney Flynn drew over her, and he drunk, coming from the fair of Cloon; that had left her complete: but welcome be the will of God!"

* Published by C. H. Kelly, 26, Paternoster-row. 1s. net.

Anyhow, she needed help. You had to unload her, and convey her indoors, where custom demanded that she should straightway be put to bed. Meantime, the donkey had to be seen to, fed and watered, and comforted generally.

In a few hours Judy would have revived sufficiently to take an honoured place in the kitchen, and drink innumerable cups of tea. The maids waited on her willingly, for she was of a gentle, kindly behaviour, humble and cheery, and full of harmless gossip, what they called "chaw-the-rag"—I don't know why. As for us children, we found Judy delightful every way. She was a spare, rosy little old body, with very white hair and very dark eyes. Summer and winter she wore a big blue cloak, and a cap with wide frills, over which a small red shawl was folded cornerwise. Her hands were small and smooth—I doubt if they had ever done much hard work—but, as Judy would say, "the day for work is gone by now for me, though God be wid the time I could carry a can of water from the well wid anyone!" We never could imagine her attempting anything more arduous than knitting, or telling her beads.

She told stories, however. This was one of her greatest charms in our eyes. Hans Andersen was a part of one's existence; one flew behind the reindeer with Gerda; one shivered with the little match-girl. Judy's tales were on a different plane, but they too fed the fancy. And then they were really and truly stories. She knew the very people they were about, and that the Good People, or the Gentry (for you must never call these beings "fairies!") would have carried off. They were said then to be "away."

Why, Bridie Moran was no more than a third or fourth cousin of Judy's own, and after, as was supposed, she being dead and buried, didn't she appear to her very brother, and told him, it was what she wasn't dead at all at all, only "away." And she instructed him how to get her back. He was to go to a certain ruined house, and there at midnight he'd see the Gentry on horses in red cloaks riding out of the gates, and Bridie among them. So all that came to pass, but he just missed catching hold of Bridie. It might be the sup of whiskey he had with him.

The Gentry, Judy explained, were really fallen angels, that got permission from Almighty God, when they had to leave Paradise, to go and live in the raths that speckle the face of rural Ireland. We children often went to one of these great silent mounds close by, but we never saw any of the women "with long hair as yalla as butter," and they with crowns of gold upon their heads, nor heard the "piannas" and fiddles that Judy said were always being played there.

There were other stories, too, of the dreadful famine year, when you'd see people "digging half a field, and not getting a dinner after" (we still speak here of "digging the dinner," i.e., potatoes); of sorrows and separations. Judy hasn't one left now of the big long family she

"rared." But she never complained. "God's good!" she would say, "that never left me without a rush and the dipping of it!"—an expression that refers to a primitive mode of lighting now fallen into disuse. And what wonderful blessings were evoked by the bestowal of some (otherwise) unconsidered trifle!

"I pray you may have a long life; gold, silver and brass; health to enjoy them, and a happy death!"; or, sweetest of all, "May Almighty God be with the souls of them you love, this day in Paradise!"

Looking back to what
Time in mists confounds,

I fancy a certain kinship between Judy and her congeners with the tribe of wandering singers and story-tellers who, within living memory, supported themselves by the exercise of these gifts in Ireland. They were always sure of welcome and "share of whatever's going" from the kindly, leisurely country folk. They made no stay anywhere. Neither did Judy. After a day or two you loaded her up again, and set her and her donkey on their way to the next stopping place. She never waited to wear out her welcome, but went about from one to another "like snuff at a wake." As I remember her, she was a contented, kindly, very pious soul, who accepted our hospitality with a certain confiding air, not without a dignity that forbade any spoken acknowledgment.

And this attitude towards her entertainers links Judy and her fellow-wanderers back through long ages, perhaps fancifully, with the days when poets and historians held high place in Ireland; when, as Mr. Yeats tells us, Seanchan was ready to die, in order that thereby he might "proclaim the right of the poets"; when

There was a green branch hung with many a bell

Eire;

And from its murmuring greenness, calm of faery,

A Druid kindness, on all hearers fell.

I like that "Druid kindness;" may it last, whatever be our rule!

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

SWEATING IN THE CITY.

Is religion a matter of Church attendance and occasional spiritual emotion merely, or is it a principle which should control and direct us in all our relations of life? It is dawning upon some that the only religion worth having is one that will direct us in the market place, or on the political platform as well as in the home and the Church. If so, then the methods of commerce is a fit topic for a religious journal.

A young man told the writer a few days ago that his firm was requiring him to work from 9.30 a.m. to 10 p.m. three days a week, and occasionally to keep at it all night. His pay was 24s. per week, no extras for overtime. The work he had to do, though not of a high order, required accuracy and therefore close attention. Even during ordinary hours the monotony of it palled, but carried on for an excessive time the strain became very great, especially on the eyesight. After a week of such work the body became limp and the mental and spiritual faculties stagnant.

This is not a solitary case, and the firms who are thus guilty of small pay and long hours are just those which modern finance is calling into existence; establishments that live on new issues of stock and dealings in old ones. Thus the sin against humanity is participated in by society, for the holders of the stock think only of the dividends, and never ask at what price they are secured. There can be no motive for the act except greed. For there is a large surplus of available labour, and even if there were not, and the long hours were absolutely necessary—justice demands that a material compensation should be offered. The capitalist in fixing his prices requires that all wear and tear should be paid for, and an additional profit provided besides; but in dealing with human beings some employers are reckless of the wear and tear to the frames of those they engage, for they do not share the loss.

How is it that with all our talk of an eight-hours day this sweating goes on in the very heart of the Empire? Just now word comes from Australia that it is proposed that clerks shall have 48s. per week of 38 hours. They are alive to the evil there. Probably the chief reason is the great employment of female labour. No one would refuse the right to labour to the gentler sex, but many of the effects are disastrous. More and more clerical work is being done by typing, and many girls are taken on as learners, receiving little or no wages, though the employers make them a source of profit to themselves, and a good average wage for a typist is 25s. per week. The consequence is that men's wages are reduced to this figure, and the large surplus of unemployed labour enables employers to coerce their staff to work overtime on pain of dismissal.

Another feature of City life is the employment of boys. A lad told the writer that he left home by the workmen's train to save expense. He had to get his breakfast at Lockhart's, on arrival at the City—a penny cup of cocoa and a piece of bread—and then wait about until the office opened. His dinner consisted of bread and meat, which he brought with him from home. This was all he had until his return home in the evening about 7.30. Poor fare for a growing lad! He earned 1s. and spent 7d., 5d. being the fare. His employment, being that of a messenger, was teaching him nothing to qualify him for a better post.

These low wages are reacting all round. The cost of food, fuel, and rent, tends to increase, many of the workers have to live in lodgings. Those who cater for them have to ruin themselves or provide imperfect accommodation because of the small amount the worker can pay. And if a portion of the wages is occasionally spent on cheap amusements, who can blame? Life was not meant to be a dull, monotonous round of labour and cheese-maring economy.

As for churches and chapels, they are beginning to feel the effects, both in sparse attendance and falling revenues, so that they lean more and more upon their richer patrons. One bad result of this is shown in the following incident: A young lady of earnest religious disposition, but no longer able to accept the old orthodoxy, sought a new religious home. She was directed to a congregation of broader views; but, on attending the service, she saw a layman in authority whom she knew as a great sweater in the City. She felt that the church which honoured him would not suit her, and did not visit that church again.

The evil is great and the remedy not easy to find. The result of recent strikes has not been encouraging. It has shown that whoever loses, it is not the employer; he can always recoup himself, and the higher prices react on the workers. Something more drastic will have to be attempted, but it is not our object to formulate what. But the insistence of a higher sense of duty will help. Not everything can be put down to the stress of competition. There are successful employers who take a higher sense of their duty. If the wider view of religion, too, which we have indicated became common, a higher civic ideal would result, and all social ills can be remedied when the will is there. The dumb desire of the people has been voiced by the poet:

'Tis life of which our nerves are scant,
More life and fuller that we want.

Will the cry of the children for bread be always answered by a stone? Not if religion be made a reality in every department of life!

ANGLO-GERMAN AMENITIES.

SIR,—I have read with great pleasure the interview with Professor Sieper, of Munich, and wish strongly to support Mr. Farley's appeal in his letter to you. I would especially like families belonging to our churches to invite young Germans to visit them or board with them. When in 1910 some sixty German university students came over with Professor Sieper, I assisted Lady Courtney and others in finding homes for some of them who desired to stay several months in England, and I am certain there is no better way of drawing together the two kindred nations than personal and family intercourse. I have a large number of addresses which I will hand to Professor Sieper, who comes to London next week for the Conference, of which I enclose particulars.

At the same time will you allow me to call attention to the excellent work being done in the matter of interchange of visits by the Co-operative Holidays Association, of Manchester, with Sir Wm. Mather as president. Both Mr. Farley and myself this past summer took over to Germany large parties of British men and women who had previously never been outside the United Kingdom, and all came home with new and better views of their German cousins.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES WEISS.

THE UNION OF BAPTISTS.

SIR,—The Rev. H. E. B. Speight is mistaken in stating that "The Old General Baptist body was united in 1879 to the New Connection." Not in that year, but a dozen years later, the New Connexion of General Baptists united, not with the Old General Baptist body, but with the Particular Baptists, a very different thing.

An article on Baptists in your paper for December 1, 1900, gives particulars of this union.—Yours, &c.,

MODERN CHRISTIAN THOUGHT.

Christian Thought since Kant. By Edward Caldwell Moore. London: Duckworth & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

MODERN Christian thought is woven of many strands, and the man who comes to it without any special philosophical and historical training, desirous, perhaps, of taking an intelligent interest in it for the first time, or maybe of equipping himself so as to be able to give a reason for the faith that is in him, requires a guide. The numbers of such men increase every day. This is part of the quickening interest in religion which characterises the present generation. In many it takes an intellectual form. Modern men are not content to be spoon-fed by their religious teachers—a fact which has a healthy reaction upon the teachers themselves. Recent controversy aroused many questions in the minds of quiet people who took no part in it, but felt its disturbance. The development of modern natural and social science affects the intelligent Christian in the direction of a kind of self-interrogation as to what difference, if any, all these new things make in the grounds of his religious belief. He is ready to take "new views of things," but has the feeling that the value of the "newer view" depends largely upon the possibility of relating it organically with the main stream of traditional thought. He wants to get it into its proper background and setting. At least, this is true of the wise man. There are, indeed, many foolish among us. There has been a kind of mushroom growth of heretics! The glamour of being an "advanced man" has attracted to the ranks not a few of those who have nothing to do save to wave some provocative tag of scepticism or rationalism, or to cry out some catch-word. The cause of progress is much damaged and hindered by these ridiculous free lances, who are a real danger to those whom they have gratuitously chosen as their friends.

The eager young man—of whom there are many in our "liberal" churches—eager to strike his blow for liberty and progress, needs to be told plainly that the right to be heterodox has to be purchased at a considerable price, part of which is a diligent, careful, sympathetic study of traditional thought. He is inclined to go about pricking at the traditionalist, but it is himself that is foolish. The picking up of a cheap weapon, manufactured probably in the forges of a spurious rationalism, and the flourishing of it vigorously, does not give a man the right to a place in the vanguard of religious thought. He needs to be told that the effectiveness of his blow depends less upon his knowledge of the specific idea which he appropriates almost casually, than upon his knowledge of the tradition against which he is apt to rail. No movement can begin de novo, or can operate in vacuo. If a man cuts himself off from tradition, there will be an end, not of tradition, but of him. He cannot but be an ephemeral, brought to birth in the heat of a critical period. The heterodox man is often contemptuous of the traditionalist, yet it is precisely he who should know and understand traditional thought more than anybody else.

One of the dangers of cheap literature of the serious sort is that a man picks up tit-bits of argument and tags of illustration, and out of them forms a flimsy scheme which has no conscious relation to the matrix-thought either of the philosopher he sponges upon, or of the still deeper matrix-thought of the ages. He commits a practical repudiation of history, and by taking no serious thought of the past stultifies the idea of evolution, under whose banner he doubtless imagines that he serves. A recruit to the progressive army ought to be able to pass a measurement test; yet how many of the recruits now offering would have to be rejected on this count alone! Happily, there are those who are coming to the rescue in this matter; and, while it must remain an impossibility for all to go through the necessary philosophical and historical training which alone would fit them to be in any sense authoritative teachers, thanks to the work of such men as Professor Moore it is possible for every willing man to become an intelligent and effective "progressive" through a clear and adequate appreciation of the main lines of traditional Christian philosophy.

The book before us is a little masterpiece in its way. It covers a long period, and deals with the contributions of several epoch-making thinkers—Kant, Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, Schleiermacher, and others. It is an extraordinary combination of compactness and lucidity. Nothing vital is omitted; and the line of development is clearly shown; the organism of progressive thought is made plain to the ordinary man. "He that runs, may read" this book. It gives, with the firm strokes of a master, the outlines of those alternating and interwoven movements of destruction and construction in theology which correspond to the katabolism and anabolism of the biologist. It devotes considerable space to the modern natural and social sciences in their bearing on Christian thought; and the concluding chapter gives an account of the contributions which have been made by England and America to this moving stream, which, truly, did not originate in Germany, but did gather there into so mighty a reservoir. It is a book which the student will welcome, for it will guide him safely, and even happily, through many of those places which even to his devotion must sometimes seem arid. It is a book particularly to be read and studied by the layman in whose open mind much light has come, begetting new ideas and new lines of thought which he finds difficult to systematise and to relate to each other and to the past out of which they have come to him. It will not make a man a philosopher or a theologian; but it will save him from much ineffective thinking, and much foolishness; and will impress him with the extraordinary vitality and inspiration of those who have gone before him, and apart from whom thought in him cannot come on to its perfectness.

A STUDY OF TEMPERAMENTS.

Tryfield. By G. and M. Hayling. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

IN spite of its unusual length—just over 400 pages—we finish the last chapter of this charming book with sincere regret. The whole purpose of the book is given us in the concise and well-written little preface; it is really a study of child character, remarkable for its clearness of insight and sympathy of treatment. So real do the four little personalities, with whom the book mainly concerns itself, appear to us, and so true to life are the doubts and difficulties, hopes and fears with which they are beset, that we constantly find ourselves smiling at the recollection of some precisely similar situation in our own past childhood. Though we plunge straight into the story with the very first paragraph, the first quarter of the book is divided into three portions, presenting the three chief characters, viz., Sir James Maine, his son Chris, and the Owner of Tryfield. The rest of the book comprises just one week of the children's lives, each day full of incident and suggestion. Al, the Owner of Tryfield, is the spoilt, ill-mannered, jealous son of Daphne Wainwright, a young widow who has had an unhappy married life, and whose desire to bring up her three young children wisely and well is overshadowed and marred by the fear of undue harshness and of seeing in them the traits which had ruined their father. At the outset of the story she marries again, and, though the new influence brought to bear on the children is entirely good and helpful, it is then that the results of her upbringing show themselves in all their defects. Al's passionate, jealous, unreasoning nature, and his determination to hate the new step-father, the usurper, are drawn with masterly realism, and we recognise how each capitulation to his ungoverned temper leads him further and further downhill. The other characters are excellent—Chris, Al's new step-brother, a fine, warm-hearted, English schoolboy, Muriel, Al's little sister, who soon discovers that she likes the Usurper, but whose loyalty to Al provokes a severe struggle between duty and inclination, and Stephen, aged 6, the youngest of the Wainwright family. The latter is a most amusing and whimsical character, with his sometime air of old-world fatalism.

"Have you heard," asked Sir James, in the course of conversation, "that one of the stable cats has kittens?"

"Chris said so," said Stephen, "and we went to see them, but now Charley has drowned all but one. Didn't you wish it could have had puppies just for once? But it wouldn't. No cat could."

The dialogue is often amusing, and always interesting and lifelike. There are a few misprints which will no doubt be corrected when the book reaches its second edition. We congratulate these new authors on their success, and shall look forward with interest to another volume from the pen of G. and M. Hayling.

CATCH-MY-PAL. By the Rev. Robert J. Patterson, LL.B. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. net.

MR. PATTERSON is well known as the founder of "Catch-my-palism," the popular name for the temperance movement which, after sweeping the North of Ireland, has spread far and wide over the world and has rescued many of the most hopeless victims of the drink craving. The pals were originally seven, who met in Mr. Patterson's manse one July evening in 1909; they are now to be numbered by hundreds of thousands. This little book gives a vivid account of their methods and achievements and answers some criticisms that have been levelled against them; it should be read by all who desire first-hand information in regard to the latest and most effective of temperance organisations.

MAKERS AND TEACHERS OF JUDAISM. C. F. Kent, Ph.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1911. 5s. net.

A BOOK which has no preface, and begins with $XCI., leaves something to be desired by way of clearness of purpose. The title does not indicate sufficiently the character of the book. These are, however, so far as the present writer has observed, the only defects of a very excellent book. It appears to form part of a series bearing the general title of the "Historical Bible," and the method adopted is to place extracts from the Bible in their historical order, with short explanations of their purpose and bearing upon the history of the time illustrated. The period covered by the present volume is from 586 B.C. to the death of Herod the Great. The explanatory matter is very good, being clear, concise and adequate. The author does not think it his duty to disparage the later Judaism, as is so often done. Two chronological charts and some maps add greatly to the value of the book. It ought to be very useful to teachers of adult classes.

LITERARY NOTES.

As the result of investigations undertaken by the Rev. J. H. and Mrs. Harris in West Africa on behalf of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society last year, Mr. Harris has written a book entitled "Dawn in Darkest Africa." It deals with some of the leading social and labour problems in tropical Africa, and contains material of deep interest to the administrator, the merchant, and the missionary societies. An introduction has been written by Lord Cromer. Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. are the publishers.

* * *

A VOLUME of translations in prose from the poems of Mr. Rabindranath Tagore, the Indian poet, will be published in November by the Indian Society. They are chiefly religious in character, and will be edited and introduced by Mr. W. B. Yeats. Mr. Tagore has just left England for America, where he intends to remain for the winter, returning to this country next year.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. are publishing a work by Professor Henry Thatcher Fowler, of Brown University, entitled "A History of the Literature of Ancient Israel from the Earliest Times to 135 B.C." The author's object has been to present in chronological order the story of the Old Testament and earliest apocryphal writings, showing at the same time the vital relationship between them and the general history of the people.

* * *

Two other books of interest to students of theology will also be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. The first, entitled "Jesus," is by Dr. G. H. Gilbert; the second, "A Psychological Study of Religion: its Origin, Function, and Future," is by Professor J. H. Leuba.

* * *

MR. MURRAY announces a book entitled "A Chain of Prayer across the Ages," compiled and arranged for daily use by Dr. Selina Fitzherbert Fox. This is a collection of prayers gathered from the widest sources extending over a period of forty centuries, which can be used either for family worship or private devotion. Great care has been taken in selecting those for the special seasons of the Christian Year, as well as several for the various events in the life of the home and the life-history of the nation.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

VICISTI GALILÆE!*

You have heard of the Coliseum, that vast circus in Rome where hundreds of years ago men and beasts, and men and men, fought with and killed one another, making an awful game of Death to mark a holiday? The Coliseum is half-ruined now, and the game is played no more. Did you ever hear how the last game of Death was played in the Coliseum?

Long stretches of sand in unfathomable distances. It is like the seashore, but there is no sea, only sand; dry, heaped-up, flowing in little ripples and waves, trailing in eddies before hot gusts of wind, piling in hillocks and mounds, lifting and scattering in light clouds and spray. Vast grey, yellow, empty spaces reaching away and away to the sunset. No, not quite empty; here is something else than sand—a confused and tumbled heap of ruins. A splendid temple to the Sun once stood here; and its great carved columns and walls lie shattered, its statues have fallen from their pedestals, its altars are thrown down. Already the sand is creeping, stealing, drifting, to cover up the ruins and hide them from the eye of man. If you go to that spot to-day you will find no trace of the buried temple. For hundreds of years the sand has rolled over it like the sea.

There is no sound; only a silence that may be felt. Presently an unearthly colour sweeps the huge horizons, and the sunset flames into blood-red. The vast countenance of the desert changes, and the heaps of ruins flush into warmth. But what is that, standing tall and erect in the changed and changing light?

A Cross?

Yes, a Cross; rising from a foundation of heaped fallen stones. A mighty statue, mutilated and shattered, lies at the foot of the Cross. It is the Sun God, still magnificent in ruin, in whose honour this temple was raised.

There is a sound of one picking his way among the stones, and a man comes towards the Cross—a haggard, unkempt figure with a long grey beard and matted hair. Muttering to himself in the way of lonely men, he stoops over the fallen god, and makes to spurn it with his foot. He gazes round on the desolation with triumph in his face. Then he flings up his arms to the Cross and a shout breaks the silence like a blow: "Vicisti Galilæe!" he cries, "Vicisti Galilæe! Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!"

The west deepens into a yet more lurid crimson. It draws the man's eyes—"Is earth on fire to the west?" he murmurs, "or is the Demon-God wrath at his fall?"

Listen! Surely some voice is speaking. Is he not alone, then, in this dim immensity of desert to which he has fled to escape the world?

Wake!

Thou heedless dreamer, lazying out a life
Of self-suppression, not of selfless love!

Who speaks? His eyes gaze widely over the spaces. Is that a cloud of sand-spray between his eyes and the west? Or . . . is it a shape with wings, sweeping by him pointing to the sun? Again a voice breathing a word in his ear: "Rome! Rome!" Suddenly a light breaks over his face and transfigures it. "It is the Call of God," he cries, and sinks to his knees before the Cross. Then, quickly rising, he turns his back on Cross and temple, and

Sets his face

By waste and field and town of alien tongue,
Following a hundred sunsets, and the sphere
Of westward-wheeling stars; and every dawn
Strikes from him his own shadow on to Rome.

Rome at last; not "pagan" Rome, but in name at least Christian Rome. In its splendid ways the old hermit of the desert, all but deaf with age and weariness, is borne along by the brawling, jostling stream of men. But he heeds neither oath nor laughter, nor ever looks aside. Ever and anon he murmurs, "The Call of God." Whither? to what end?

Now he is in the midst of an eager crowd, hurried with it towards a vast building that looms ahead. Above the din of the voices about him are heard maddened yells and roars. Three great negroes push through the mob, trailing after them in the dust the tawny body of a dead lion. The crowd rushes under a giant portal where soldiers interfere and direct—through great vaulted passages, up high flights of stone steps; until coming to a sudden standstill he is flung upon a stone seat, and clings there, dazed and trembling.

He sits panting, almost unconscious, closing his dazzled eyes, half blinded in the gloom. It seems an eternity before he comes to himself and looks timidly round. . . . A vast multitude of faces with staring eyes all gazing down; serried masses of faces, tier upon tier, tier upon tier, from ground to roof of a great circus; purple awnings stretched across the top, shutting out the glaring sky; a smother of dust and a dreadful steam rising from the arena; a shivering and simmering and palpitating of the faces in the hot air; a hissing and a whispering of talk as of waves drawing down a shingly beach; the population of a city, massed on the stone seats, watching, watching—what?

Men and beasts, butchering and being butchered down there on the blood-wet sand. Men fighting to the death, dying, dead . . . to make a Roman holiday.

Exhausted, shrinking, he looks down on all these things. A shout of approval at a great killing stroke goes up from thousands of throats. A victorious gladiator strides over his fallen opponent, glancing round for the signal to finish. There is yelling and hissing and cheering and a stretching out of hands with thumbs turned down. He hides his eyes in his trembling hands to shut out the accursed sight. . . . Then, like a flash of light, a blinding vision of a fallen god and a Cross against a blood-red sky, and a thunder in his ears—the Call of God!

All his weakness gone—all his age turned into strong youth. A leap from his stone seat, a thrusting aside of hindering hands, a bound down the high steps and over the barrier into that arena of death. Then he

Flung himself between

The gladiatorial swords, and called FORBEAR!

In the great name of him who died for men, Christ Jesus!

For one moment there is a silence as of death; then a hiss as from a wilderness of snakes and a roar like the breaking sea—

And then a shower of stones that stoned him dead,

And then once more a silence as of death.

The gladiators draw together and look round doubtfully. Who is he, lying there so quiet on the sand after his mad leap and shout? One of them goes and stoops over the crushed and broken form. An old man, with tangled grey hair and pitiful blood-stained rags, and a smile on his lips. He is murmuring something; the gladiator stoops lower to catch it. . . .

"Vicisti Galilæe! Vicisti Galilæe!"

Then silence. But—

His dream became a dream that woke the world;

For while the frantic rabble in halfamaze

Stared at him dead, thro' all the nobler hearts

In that vast Oval ran a shudder of shame.

The Baths, the Forum gabbled of his death,

And preachers lingered o'er his dying words,

Which would not die, but echoed on to reach

Honorius, till he heard them, and decreed That Rome no more should wallow in this old lust

Of Paganism, and make her festal hour
Dark with the blood of man who murder'd man.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE. THE AUTUMN ASSEMBLY IN LONDON.

WHAT means that stirring hymn of praise, followed by the low fervent voices of men and women? We have arrived at King's Weigh House some minutes before the time of the meeting we were asked to attend last Saturday, but the proceedings appear to be already in full swing. It is the service of aspiration and consecration wherewith the League always begins its Assemblies. Therein lies the secret of the power which has enabled it to overcome its recent difficulties. The newcomers therefore find themselves in an atmosphere of spiritual fervour, which strikes the note of all the subsequent proceedings.

It was a large, united assembly over which Mr. A. Dawson presided. He congratulated the members upon the abundant evidences of life, and concluded by reading a message from the Rev. R. J. Campbell, whose name was received with loud applause. The late President, while regretting his enforced separation from the League, sent his best wishes, expressed his approval of the programme, and commended the members for the lofty purpose which animated them.

The hon. secretary, Miss A. H. Alleyne, who was heartily cheered in recognition of her untiring voluntary efforts during the last six months, followed with her statement. She read out a long list of Vice-Presidents and Hon. Associates who had accepted office, among the new Vice-Presidents not already reported being Canon Lilley, Dr. Tudor Jones, and Mr. Hall Caine. The Bishop of Lichfield, while unable to join any organisation, wrote: "Let me assure the members of the League that I am heartily at one with them in my desire for a more widely recognised spiritual fellowship, for an honest search after truth in religion, and for a more earnest endeavour in the cause of social regeneration," which was practically a full endorsement of the aims of the League.

Mr. E. Capleton, the hon. treasurer of the League, bore testimony to the invaluable help rendered by Miss A. Stevens, the hon. collector. As all work had been voluntary the expenses had been small, and the balance in hand was substantial. With new offices, however, and increased social work, they would want money, and finance would be properly organised.

Among other speakers was the Secretary of the New Congregational Church at Woolwich (affiliated to the League). In the first year of their existence, just closed, their membership had increased from 53 to 156, and they had raised £400. Their Wednesday evening lectures were very successful.

An invitation from Bolton that the League should meet there next Easter was heartily accepted.

At the close of the business an address was delivered by Mr. Horace Leaf upon the purpose of the League, followed by a paper by Mr. J. M. Glen, M.A., of Islington, on the question, "How far does the Doctrine of Immanence imply the Brotherhood of Man?" The speaker's presentation of immanence was followed with the closest attention, and his practical conclusion was that man rose in the scale of being just so far as he became useful to his fellows. An interesting discussion followed. It is worthy of note that the whole of the proceedings were conducted by the members. It being Saturday no minister was present. The Rev. A. A. Bourne presided at the devotional meeting but had to leave immediately afterwards. In the open sessions which followed representative speakers addressed the League by invitation.

The session on Monday forenoon was in the interests of the Social Service Department. Mrs. Lamond, who presides over the Home of Service at King's-square, was in the chair. The Lady Sanitary Inspector of Finsbury, Mrs. Greenwood, spoke of the progress that had been made in sanitary science during the last fourteen years, and gave her warm approval to the methods of the Home of Service, where cheap dinners were given to mothers and children, milk was supplied, advice given, young people were helped to situations, and sometimes housed temporarily. After a brief discussion the meeting was addressed by Sister Esther (of Whitefield's) on "The Housing Problem," who contended that the true solution was to raise the economic value of the worker; Sister Margery (West London Mission) on "Methods of Social Work," who pleaded for more unity among the Churches; and Sister Maggie (Bloomsbury). While all the Sisters proved to be first-rate speakers, Sister Maggie's address, as she described her night experiences on the Embankment, and in the slums of the West, went to the hearts of her hearers. There was no means, she affirmed, to reclaim the souls of the degraded except the appeal to divine love. That awoke a response in the most callous.

In the afternoon the Rev. Donald Fraser, of Liverpool, spoke on "Revelations Old and New." He condemned traditionalism, and said that the only truth to us was what we felt to be the truth. A reference to sin caused the discussion to turn upon that topic, and considerable difference of opinion was manifested. Some said they had no sense of sin, while others were equally certain that all must have it. Evidently here is a living question of the day.

At the tea-table the Rev. S. Beddow, of Leicester, spoke on "The Future of Organised Christianity." Christianity, he said, was a spirit. The future Church must have a Hospital Department for comfort, a School Department for education, Civil Service to help the downtrodden, and a War Department to attack all evil. This age had created the economic man: he must be attacked. Religion must not, like football, be left to professionals. The Church must interpret Society to itself. All this meant trouble, but true religion must end in the Cross.

In the evening there was a large public meeting in the church, presided over by Mr. A. Dawson. Lady Bunting spoke of the services of women in the past and present. She sometimes wished all women would withdraw from church life for a while, in order to prove their value. Mrs. Savill, M.D., spoke of the evils of forcible feeding, and the meeting unanimously passed a resolution in condemnation of the practice. Mr. H. D. Harben and the Rev. F. R. Swan also spoke. Mr. Snowden, M.P., spoke on the present position of the women's question in relation to the Government. There had been a moment, he said, when, if the women had been united, the victory would have been won, and he still hoped if moderate counsels prevailed that a measure might be passed. The last speaker was Miss Muriel Matters who gave an address on the spiritual aspect of the movement. Thus the meeting closed on a high note.

On Tuesday afternoon a largely attended session listened to Mrs. Julia Sears' exposition of Faith Healing. An interesting experiment was made, the result of which cannot be known yet. Some questions were put, but there was no discussion. Many of the audience, while sympathetic, could evidently not go all the way with the lecturer. At the tea-table conference the Rev. J. J. Pool, of Woolwich, opened a discussion upon "How to Deal with the Underman."

The public meeting in the church which followed was well attended. Carpenter's hymn, "England Arise," was sung, and prayer offered by the Rev. Stanley James, of Walthamstow.

Mr. Richard Robinson, of Manchester, who presided, said that the object of the League was from the basis of religious conviction, and from the outlook of the freest theology, to approach the problems of the day. The church should lead the conscience of the people, but if it held back some other institution must do it.

The Rev. H. S. McClelland, of Finchley, said that the religious sects erected separate roofs to shelter them from the storms of life, but they proved unstable. Their creeds were practically the same, but the interpretation different. They must come out into the open; no close system would suffice; the thing that can't move must be abandoned by the thing that can't stand still. Men could not stand still to-day, because their knowledge of the world had grown, and the development of science had destroyed the vague fears that used to beset men. How could they sing on Sunday that they were aliens, when, during the rest of the week, they felt that life is good? He held that the rise of the democratic spirit had taught them that the only authority was the categorical imperative within. Political and religious freedom must go hand in hand. A sincere reconstruction of beliefs must be the first work of a united church.

Dr. W. E. Orchard followed. He suggested several lines of study for League thought. Let them discover the things that unite. Some professed that God was three Persons in One, others that He was only One Person; frankly he confessed he did not know, and he thought it did not matter. What interested him was the basal truth that had made these beliefs such a force in the past. Hell, he thought, was very real, but it might be the same place as heaven. It was the character of the soul that created the atmosphere. They had recovered the humanity of Jesus Christ, and the thought that Jesus was man filled some persons with pride, but it made him very humble, for if Jesus were man, then "What am I?" Some critics were throwing doubt on the historical reality of Jesus. He suggested that members of the League might help to clear up that point.

Miss Maude Royden made a moving appeal for equal morality between the sexes. There must not be two standards, otherwise Society would never be just or moral.

Mr. Herbert Burrows spoke upon "Religion and Social Reconstruction," and Dr. Tudor Jones, in a short speech, emphasised the importance of trying to understand the signification of the universe and ourselves. History, he said, distinguished between the sects and religion. God must be in the is. There was something higher than the intellect. If they searched they would find a meaning in themselves deeper than they knew. The Benediction closed a series of meetings that have surpassed expectation.

BIRMINGHAM'S WELCOME TO THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

THE Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas commenced his ministry at the Old Meeting Church on Sunday, October 6. During the week following a meeting of the congregation was held to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Thomas to Birmingham.

The Senior Warden, Mr. George Yoxall, presided over a large attendance of members.

Letters of apology were received from the Bishop of Birmingham, the Rev. Sidney Berry, of Carr's Lane Chapel; Dr. Carpenter, Mrs. Osler, Mrs. Peyton, Sir James Smith, and Mr. Ernest Martineau.

Mr. Yoxall, in moving a resolution giving a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Thomas, said the members of the congregation were prepared to second his efforts by the devoted service of a body of willing and enthusiastic workers.

Miss Clara Martineau, in seconding the resolution, remarked that the members of the Old Meeting gloried in the traditions of their church, and assured the new minister they would endeavour to maintain the high ideal that had always been before them of duty, loyalty, and personal service.

General Phelps submitted to the meeting that Mr. Lloyd Thomas's principal function would be that of a stirrer-up of strife. He would have to make every man strive within himself between the better part and the worse part. He would have to be a fomentor of discomfort, making them all aware there were conditions unsatisfactory around and about them, and it was their duty to make something better out of those conditions. He would also have to be a stimulator of unrest. He must make them feel unrest where they considered things were going wrong.

Miss Lucy Griffiths spoke on behalf of the Sunday schools and young people connected with the institutions of the church.

The other speakers included Mr. Allen Edwards, Mr. J. C. Warren, of Nottingham; the Revs. J. Worsley Austin and F. Hemming Vaughan.

In acknowledging the welcome Mr. Thomas referred to the long and distinguished ministry of Mr. Wood, and said he could not have ventured to become the successor of such a man did he not know that Mr. Wood himself approved the congregation's choice, and gave him his undeserved benediction and encouragement. Speaking of the young life connected with the church, Mr. Thomas said that there was enough material, had they the wisdom and consecration to train and guide it aright, to build up such a congregation as would rejoice the heart of any minister. He appealed to the members of the congregation not to dissipate their energies, but to utilise the leisure not already fruitfully employed and devote it to the church. He urged upon his hearers the importance of regular attendance. The surest way of breaking a minister's and every other church worker's heart and of paralysing him in his activity was to keep away from the services. At the moment things were not well with organised religion anywhere. But the tide was turning. Materialism was beaten back at every point. A new day of revived religious enthusiasm and seriousness was about to dawn, and every church had to work trustfully and courageously for that better future. He hoped and believed that the Old Meeting Church would continue to do its part, and prayed that God would prosper all their labour done in the spirit of Christ.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Church of the Messiah school-rooms, Birmingham, on the 16th inst. In the absence of the President, who was abroad, the chair was taken by the Rev. H. E. Dowson. There were also present the Revs. D. Agate, J. W. Austin, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, W. W. C. Pope, C. Roper, H. J. Rossington, W. R. Shanks, C. J. Street, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, F. H. Vaughan, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Messrs. W. Byng Kenrick, J. Lewis, F. W. Monks, C. R. W. Offen, J. Wigley, and the Secretary.

Apologies for absence had been received from the Revs. W. T. Bushrod, Dr. Carpenter, W. H. Drummond, E. D. P. Evans, F. K. Freeston, A. Golland, H. Gow, A. Hall, C. Hargrove, H. D. Roberts, W. G. Tarrant, Joseph Wood, J. J. Wright, Sir Wm. B. Bowring, Miss Spenser, Messrs. H. Bailly, J. Hall Brooks, H. P. Greg, G. H. Leigh, T. F. Robinson, A. S. Thew, J. H. White, L. N. Williams, and G. W. R. Wood.

Among other business the following was dealt with:—The Chairman moved and Mr. Monks seconded, "That this Committee, meeting for the first time after the death of Mr. John Harrison, the recently appointed treasurer of the National Conference, desires to express the deep sense of loss thereby sustained by the Conference and the churches it represents, which he loved so much and served in so many ways. The members, moreover, feel a keen personal sorrow in the loss of a friend, who held a special place in their affectionate regards. They wish to convey to Mr. C. W. Harrison and the family the assurance of most sincere sympathy in their bereavement." The resolution was carried, all standing.

The vacancy in the treasurership was filled by the appointment of Mr. F. W. Monks, who was cordially welcomed, with an expression of sympathy in his recent bereavement through the loss of his father.

The annual accounts showed a larger increase than usual in the number of contributors, and that the Triennial Fund debit balance had been cleared by a friend, who wished to be anonymous. On the current account there was due to the treasurer £26 Os. 3d.

The following annual report of the Ministerial Settlements Board was received:—

"Since the Board commenced operations in the early part of 1910, seventy-three ministers and forty-four congregations have placed themselves on its books, one minister and one congregation being entered for the second time. Eleven ministers and sixteen congregations have entered their names during the past year. Thirteen ministers on the list have received appointments during the year. Seven names have been withdrawn for various reasons, and one through death. Fourteen congregations on the list have effected ministerial settlements during the year, several of them through the agency of the Board. At the present time twenty-four ministers and eleven congregations stand on the books. It is important to note the fact that of the sixteen congregations which during the year applied for the assistance of the Board, no fewer than thirteen requested recommendations of ministers to be made to them. This is a striking indication that the advisory function of the Board meets a much-felt need, and obtains the confidence of the congregations. Twelve months ago the Confidential Committee, which exercises the function, was enlarged from three to five members, and from the very outset, in each case dealt with, there has been associated with the Confidential Committee someone (generally a member of the local Advisory Committee) connected with the district to which the congregation desiring assistance belonged. The object has been, on the one hand, to make the Committee representative (1) of both ministers and laymen, (2) of different parts of the country, and, on the other, to keep it within such limits as would enable it to perform with efficiency its difficult and delicate functions. In this, as in every other department of life, wherever selection is necessary, some disappointment is perhaps inevitable, whatever method of selection be adopted. Conscious of the difficulty of the task, the Committee may yet claim to have been guided solely by the twofold desire—to give the best advice in its power to congregations and to be perfectly fair to ministers."

This report was received, and then considerable discussion took place on the relations between the Board and the Ministerial Fellowship. Eventually the discussion was adjourned till the next meeting, when the Rev. C. J. Street gave notice that he would bring forward proposals which he believed would meet the objections that had been raised. In the meantime the existing arrangements will be continued.

The Special Committee for making an appeal for £50,000 to enlarge the sustentation fund reported that £36,295 had been promised in donations and £73 16s. in annual subscriptions. Except about £500, the donations consisted of sums ranging from £3,000 to £25. It is intended very shortly by personal canvass to give all the members of our congregations an opportunity of sharing in this memorable effort. The members present undertook to help in this work in their respective congregations. It was agreed that the next meeting be held in Manchester, if possible, on January 15.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

UNITED SERVICE AT THE DUTCH CHURCH, AUSTIN FRIARS.

A UNITED service arranged by the London District Unitarian Society was held in the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, on Sunday evening last, October 20, through the kindness of the Rev. S. Baart de la Faille, minister of the Church, and his Consistory. There was a large congregation drawn from various parts of London. Mr. A. W. Pearce, organist at the Wandsworth Unitarian Church, presided at the organ. Miss Frances E. Moore, of Croydon, was the soloist, and the choir consisted of members from Wandsworth, University Hall, Peckham, Stratford, Unity and other churches. Boy Scouts and members of the Boys' Own Brigade patrolled the streets in the vicinity of Austin Friars with notices directing the people to the church. Mr. Ronald Bartram and a number of other laymen acted as stewards. The service commenced at 7 o'clock and was conducted by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, District Minister of the Society.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant took for his text the words "When ye pray, say, 'Father.'" The burden of the sermon was that they should be better brothers if they were better sons. There was much said about brotherhood to-day, happily more than ever before. It would be happier still if the words were more frequently translated into deeds. Men spoke of it in all the churches and outside the churches. Meeting in that place, at the very heart of the Empire, thoughts came inevitably of the present outbreak of war in the nearer East. The horror of war was desolating the foremost continent of the globe, because the "sister nations" of Europe, nearly all professing to be Christians and to be followers of Jesus, had not sisterliness or brotherliness enough to set aside their jealousies and co-operate for peace. There, also, at the centre of commercial life, they could not fail to remember the war that went on between employers and employed, the so-called "unrest" of labour. How little evidence there was of any true feeling of brotherhood between the different sections of the community. Brotherliness seemed to be forgotten when the strife of tongues was loud. And once again, meeting as they were in a place so rich in historic associations, those monumental walls, whose very stones were eloquent to all who had ears to hear, spoke of the centuries of strife between those very churches whose responsibility was that of calling to mind the word that "all we are brethren, One is our Master." Happily, there was really more brotherliness to-day among the churches than ever before. But why was there so little of that spirit at work in the world? Because, among other things, the great word of Jesus—"say, 'Father'"—had not captured the imagination of men as it should. They would be better brothers if they were better sons. Continuing, he said that the higher sense, the thought of God as "Father," was not open to the devilish or brutish. It was a filial mood that alone could grasp it. That God was sovereign, was true, but it was for them to be obedient servants of His will. Whilst thinking of His rule and sovereignty, the one word that clothed the whole, as in the Lord's Prayer, was "Father—Our Father." So it must be theirs to proclaim Fatherhood as well as Brotherhood. Then the unbrotherly mood that sometimes overshadowed the life of a congregation and often darkened the wider world around would be checked. A new light would shine in the eye, a new tone would come into the voice, rendering them true helpers and harmonisers. So the whole current of ethical purpose would be filled with a new power once more. They would be better brothers if they were better sons.

Mr. Ronald Bartram, on behalf of the London District Unitarian Society, desires to thank very cordially all those who gave their help in connection with the service, and whom it is impossible to thank individually.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE half-yearly meeting of the Board of Managers was held in London on Thursday last week. A resolution expressing warm appreciation of the faithful services of the late Mr. John Harrison to the Fund since its foundation, and of sympathy with his family, was passed. Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery was appointed a manager in place of Mr. Harrison, Mr. Sydney Martineau being elected auditor in Mr. Montgomery's stead. It was reported that three new beneficiary members had since the last meeting entered into the enjoyment of their pensions. One member had died, his representatives receiving the sum of £150 5s., and also an aged minister to whom an annuity had conditionally been promised in case of retirement. Three new applications under the ordinary tables of insurance were granted. An annuity from the Philip Holt Fund, in supplement of a congregational subscription, was voted to a minister who, in his 80th year, was retiring from active service. In two cases an annual grant was promised from the same fund to assist ministers in maintaining insurances previously effected. The financial position was well maintained, though a serious loss, through death, to the annual subscription list had to be reported. There are now 110 beneficiary members on the books, including six who are, or will be immediately, in receipt of their pensions in the ordinary course, and three aged ministers receiving special grants by way of annuity.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND LABOUR EXCHANGES.

From the most recent issue of the Board of Trade Labour Gazette we learn that so far as the returns published in it are concerned, the rate of unemployment has not been so low since 1902 as during September last. It cannot too often be pointed out, however, as the Labour Gazette figures are so often mishandled for controversial purposes, that the Board of Trade statistics only refer to such trades unions as pay unemployed benefit, and that persons on strike or locked out, sick or superannuated, are excluded from the figures. Moreover, as not a quarter of the British working classes belong to trades unions, and not all trades unions pay unemployed benefit, it will be seen that an enormous proportion of workers are not as yet included in official statistics of unemployment, which neither in this nor any other industrial country cover the whole field of unemployment. Nevertheless, taken in conjunction with the returns for the Labour Exchanges, the percentage given in the Labour Gazette chart is a reliable general proof that the rate of unemployment is at present happily lower than it has been for a long time past.

Another notable feature of the Labour market in September is that changes in the rate of wages were all increases, and amounted to £15,400 per week on the wages of 260,000 workpeople. The number of vacancies notified during the period was 119,516 (men 73,340, women 23,001, boys 14,338, and girls 8,837), a daily average of 3,984 compared with 3,672 in August and 2,522 in September, 1911.

The number of vacancies filled was 90,310 (men 58,961, women 15,501, boys 9,415 and girls 6,433), a daily average of 3,010 compared with 2,936 in August and 1,916 in September, 1911.

GERMAN LABOUR EXCHANGES.

The British Labour Exchanges, although used by an increasing number of both employers and employed, have not yet attained the popularity or the efficiency of those in Germany, which, of course, have had the advantage, from the mechanical point of view, of having had a long start, and of having to deal with a population accustomed to being drilled and organised by the State. Nothing could be more interesting from the point of view of the social student than a visit to these German exchanges, especially those at Berlin, Cologne, Frankfurt, Strassburg, Ulm, Freiburg and München, which have had remarkable success, possibly because they have been very fortunate in the officials charged with their administration.

All the exchanges mentioned are clean, well-lighted, and generally well-appointed buildings (that at Freiburg was formerly a bishop's palace), provided with waiting and even with reading rooms containing not only daily papers but general literature chosen to suit all tastes. At one reading room the present writer observed on the list of books a copy of Bellamy's "Looking Backward," which proves that German officialdom has in this instance not been endeavouring to stifle the dreams that come even to your unemployed worker. In certain districts the number of places filled almost corresponds to the number of places notified, and in many of them the workman has become so accustomed to use the exchange that if on notice to leave one place, he makes application at once for another, and frequently gets it without any intermission of work whatsoever.

In the United Kingdom there has been a good deal of distrust, and sometimes severe criticism of the Exchanges by organised labour, whereas in Germany the Social Democratic Party from the first have strongly advised their followers to use the exchanges. So generally has their advice been carried out, and so satisfied are the workers with the result, that in some places, Frankfurt, for instance, employers are attempting to start independent exchanges of their own. In this respect, British and German experience have had quite opposite tendencies. Lastly, it may be not without interest to mention that the officials of the German exchanges are always most courteous to visitors, especially if they are British, and delighted to hear what is being attempted to cope with unemployment in other countries.

Harry Johnston, Dr. Ernst Sieper (Munich), Professor Wendt (Jena), the Bishop of Winchester, Sir Oliver Lodge, and others. Among the speakers will be Sir William Mather, Mr. Aneurin Williams Lord Lamington, and Lord Weardale. Mr. H. Snell is acting as secretary to the British Joint Committee; office, 167, St. Stephen's House, Westminster.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Accrington.—A lecture on the question "How did the Roman Catholic Church preserve the Bible?" was delivered by the Rev. W. Piggott in the Oxford-road schools on Wednesday, October 16. A debate had been arranged as a result of a dispute between Mr. Piggott and a Roman Catholic at an open-air meeting of the Unitarian Missionary Conference, but this fell through, and the lecture was given instead. At its close the thanks of the meeting were expressed by the Rev. A. Isherwood, a local Congregational minister.

Birkenhead.—A welcome was given to the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, the new minister of the Unitarian Church, and to Mrs. Jenkins, at a meeting in the Town Hall on October 15. Mr. A. W. Wilmer presided, supported by the Mayor (Mr. G. Proudman), Sir William Bowring, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and others. The Rev. J. E. Woodward (vicar of St. Paul's), the Rev. H. Lefroy Yorke (Wesleyan), the Rev. W. J. Tunbridge (Wesleyan), were among the ministers present, and letters of apology for absence were read from several others. Cordial speeches were made by the Chairman, the Mayor, Sir William Bowring, speaking on behalf of the Liverpool churches; and the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, as president of the Liverpool District Missionary Association. The Rev. J. E. Jenkins replied.

Bootle.—The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of West Kirby, visited the Senior Guild of the Free Church on October 22, and gave a rendering of his new drama "Abraham."

Brighton.—The anniversary of the Free Christian Church was held on Sunday and Monday, October 20 and 21. The Rev. Priestley Prime (minister) preached on the Sunday. At the Monday meeting, which was well attended, friends from other Sussex congregations were entertained. Alderman Wilson presided, and addresses were given by the Rev. J. J. Marten (Horsham), the Rev. S. Burrows (Hastings), the Rev. J. M. Connell (Lewes), the Rev. S. B. Stallworthy (Tunbridge Wells), the Rev. G. Lansdown (Chichester), and the Rev. Priestley Prime. The Brighton anniversary has become an occasion of fraternal meeting among the Sussex ministers and congregations so far as is possible considering the distances by which they are separated. Mr. Hugo Talbot, Mr. Alfred Ball, and Mr. Percival Chalk voiced the welcome of the congregation to their friendly neighbours.

Cologne: Appointment.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith, of Manchester, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of the Stanley-street Unitarian Church, and will begin his duties on November 3.

East Cheshire Christian Union.—At the quarterly meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union, held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, October 17, the Rev.

B. C. Constable, minister of the Longsight Free Christian Church, Manchester, was presented with an album, containing an illuminated address and photographs of all the churches in the Union, together with a cheque, in recognition of his services as hon. secretary of the Union for fourteen years. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., president of the Union, occupied the chair, and was supported by the treasurer, Mr. Walter Hudson; the hon. secretary, the Rev. H. E. Perry; the Revs. J. Shaw Brown, W. G. Cadman, E. G. Evans, B.A., W. Griffiths, Ph.D., W. Harrison, N. J. H. Jones, G. A. Payne, G. Pegler, B.A., H. Fisher Short, Leonard Short, G. Street, E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., and Jenkyn Thomas; and Messrs. E. B. Broadrick, J. Hall Brooks, James Oliver, Albert Slater, and many of the delegates from the churches. The Rev. H. E. Dowson said that Mr. Constable had made one of the best secretaries the Union ever had. He was one of the most optimistic men he had known, and full of true missionary zeal. Again and again he had encouraged them in their work and urged them on to new enterprises; and his industry had been untiring. The Union was immensely indebted to him, and wished to show their appreciation by the presentation of that evening. The Rev. W. Harrison, who made the presentation, said that Mr. Constable had not only served the Union with great ability and fidelity, but had also led them into new departures. He had always shown the greatest enthusiasm in missionary work, and he would be remembered as the father of the Ashton church. He had also been instrumental in starting the exceedingly promising movement at Marple. He had very great pleasure in asking him to accept from the Union this mark of their high appreciation. In his reply, Mr. Constable recalled the familiar names of ministers and laymen who, during the past twenty years, had been members of the Union, but who were now either in other fields of labour, or entered into their rest. He was glad that through a conversation with Mr. A. Hirst, he had suggested a movement at Marple, and that they had present with them that evening the newly appointed minister at Marple, the Rev. Leonard Short. If he might be allowed to mention a few things which he thought would conduce to the success of the Union, he would advise them to keep up the missionary spirit, especially as the Union was one "for missionary purposes"; to maintain the Union as the real friend of all its churches; to make it always as easy as possible for its delegates and ministers to attend its meetings; to look after the small subscribers as well as the large, in order to widen the interest in the Union; and to arrange for the members of the executive committee to visit the churches as often as possible, and thus give practical expression to the Union's interest and sympathy.

Leeds.—The second annual meeting of the Leeds branch of the British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women was held on Tuesday, October 15, in the Priestley Hall, preceded by an afternoon conference convened by Miss H. Brooke Herford for secretaries and delegates of the Affiliated Yorkshire Congregations and Lancashire Societies, the latter sending fourteen delegates. A paper on the "Duty of a Secretary" was read by Mrs. Classon Drummond, which was followed by a useful discussion. At 6.15 a service was held in Mill Hill Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold. At the evening meeting the reports of the Leeds branch, which showed a steady improvement, were read.

Liverpool Domestic Mission.—A successful exhibition and sale of work was held in the Mission buildings, Mill-street, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, October 17, 18 and 19,

A Conference organized by the Anglo-German Friendship Committee will be held in London, on Wednesday, October 30, Thursday, October 31, and Friday, November 1. Sir Frank C. Lascelles, the British President, will open the proceedings with an address, and will be followed by the German President, Se. Excellenz Graf von Leyden. Papers will be read during the Conference by Professor Dr. Karl Rathgen (Hamburg), Sir Charles Macara, Mr. Tom Garnett, Mr. J. A. Spender, Chef-Rédacteur Dr. Trefz (Hamburg), Professor Dr. Eickhoff, Sir John Macdonnell, Sir to raise funds for various purposes. On the first day the bazaar was opened by Miss Emma Bowring, in place of Mrs. John Bowring, the chair being taken by Mr. F. C. Bowring, J.P., C.C., who has generously presented a new piano to the Mission. Miss Holland performed the opening ceremony on the second day, in place of Mrs. Holland, Mr. Walter Holland being in the chair, and on the third day Mrs. Richard D. Holt opened the bazaar, Mr. Richard D. Holt, M.P., presiding.

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—The annual meeting of the Lay Preachers' Union of London and the S.E. Counties was held at Essex Hall on October 21, 1912. In the absence of the president (Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P.), the Rev. W. H. Drummond occupied the chair. The committee's report upon the second year's work contained several interesting features. A reading circle, for the study and discussion of books dealing with religious problems, had been found extremely helpful. A library had also been formed, by means of which members were able to obtain the use of a number of valuable philosophical, theological, and devotional works. Reference was also made to the fortnight in the summer during which the Union took charge of the London Unitarian van. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, who was present at the meeting, took the opportunity offered on the discussion of the report to say a few helpful and encouraging words on the work of lay preaching, and the success of the lay preachers' services on the van. Prior to the business meeting there had been an hour of social intercourse, followed by a short devotional service and address by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. The officers of the Union for the ensuing year were elected as follows:—President, Mr. E. R. Fyson; secretary, Mr. W. T. Colyer. Committee: Misses Fitzsimmons, Francis, and Withall; Messrs. A. D. Beckwith, J. Kinsman, and A. M. Stables. The hearty thanks of the Union were voted to the retiring president, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., for his services during the past two years, and also to the vice-presidents, the Revs. W. H. Drummond and J. A. Pearson.

London: Wood Green.—The anniversary services will be held at Unity Church on Sunday, October 27. On the same day the last of the special forward movement services will be held. The minister, the Rev. Joseph Wilson, will preach in the morning, and the Rev. W. Moritz Weston, D.D., Ph.D., of Croydon, in the evening.

Manchester: Longsight.—A bazaar and chrysanthemum fair will be held in the Chorlton Town Hall, to raise £1,250 for the Free Christian Church, on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, November 6, 7, 8 and 9. It will be opened on the four days respectively by Sir William B. Bowring, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and Mr. Charles Hawksley. Contributions, either in money or goods, will be gratefully acknowledged by Mrs. Constable, 16, Langdale-road, Victoria Park, Rusholme, Manchester, or the two secretaries, Mr. Oliver H. Heys, 8, Sunny Bank-road, Longsight, Manchester, and Mr. Charles H. Chorlton, 38, Ashfield-road, Rusholme, Manchester.

Mexborough.—The Free Christian Church is carrying on its activities with much enthusiasm, and the committee have decided to purchase land to build a church and school. The congregation have shown much interest in the work of the District Association, and thirty members recently travelled to Sheffield to attend a united soirée.

Muswell Hill.—Under the auspices of the London District Unitarian Society a series of three lectures will be delivered at the Muswell Hill Athenæum on Wednesday evenings, beginning Wednesday next, the 30th inst., at 8 o'clock. The lecturers will be Revs. W. W. C. Pope, Henry Gow, B.A., and J. Arthur Pearson; and the subjects to be dealt with—"The Bible we accept," "The God we worship," and "The Salvation in which we believe." The attendance and support of all friends in the neighbourhood is desired.

Southampton: The Late Mr. Thomas Isted.—The congregation of the Church of the Saviour has sustained a serious loss in the death of the treasurer, Mr. Thomas Isted, which took place on October 11 at Shirley, after a short illness, in the seventy-third year of his age. Mr. Isted had been connected with this church for thirty-three years, and as a boy worshipped with his family at Ditchling, Sussex. He was chairman of the Church Committee for many years. He frequently took the services when the congregation was without a minister, sometimes for several months at a time, and his hearers always felt the sincerity and earnestness of one who possessed unflinching faith in the power of the religion he professed. As a treasurer he was ever ready to help in any time of financial difficulty. Some years ago he represented the Shirley district on the Borough Council. On Tuesday, 15th inst., the funeral service was conducted in the church by the Rev. A. R. Andrae, M.A., and the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A. (of Poole), and afterwards at the Southampton Cemetery. There was a large attendance of relatives, members of the congregation, and other friends.

Stalybridge: Welcome Meeting.—On Saturday, October 12, a warm welcome was given to the Rev. John Ellis on his appointment as minister of the Canal-street Unitarian Church. Mr. William Thompson presided, and was supported by the Rev. John and Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Stead, and the Revs. W. Short (Bootle), A. Thornhill (Gorton), H. E. Dowson (Gee Cross), H. Fisher Short (Mossley), L. Short (Marple), H. McLachlan (Unitarian Home Missionary College), and H. E. Perry; Messrs. Elliott Haigh, F. Oliver, R. Firth, of Mossley (President of the North Cheshire Sunday School Union), A. Slater, of Hyde (secretary of the Union), and others. The chairman extended a welcome to Mr. Ellis on behalf of the church, being followed by Mr. Elliott Haigh, on behalf of the Sunday school; Mrs. Stead, who welcomed both Mr. and Mrs. Ellis on behalf of the Ladies' Congregational Society; the Rev. H. E. Dowson on behalf of the East Cheshire Union, Mr. Sinclair, the Revs. W. Short, H. McLachlan, E. G. Evans, H. Fisher Short, A. E. Taylor (Stalybridge), and others. The Rev. J. Ellis replied. Mrs. Ellis also briefly responded. The annual sermons on behalf of the Hob Hill Unitarian Sunday school were preached in the Canal-street Church on Sunday, October 13. At the morning and evening services the preacher was the Rev. Dr. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester; and at the afternoon service the Rev. John Ellis, the newly appointed minister.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

IN MEMORY OF GENERAL BOOTH.

The October number of All the World forms an interesting memorial of the late General Booth. It contains a graphic account of the memorable service which was held at Olympia after his death, and of the funeral procession, including 7,000 officers and soldiers of the Salvation Army, which made such an impression on all who saw it as it passed through the City. Very touching, too, are the extracts given in these pages from spoken tributes paid by the General to the memory of his mother, his wife, and his daughter, who was affectionately known in many lands as "the Consul." The illustrations include a picture of "Rookstone," General Booth's house at Hadley Wood, and the study where he worked.

"THE STUPENDOUS ADVENTURE OF THE UNIVERSE."

An article by Miss Evelyn Underhill dealing with the secret of life which is always awaiting our solution appeared recently in Public Opinion. This secret is, she declares, "the only practical problem in the world," and when we have discovered it we shall escape "from that 'flame of separation' which the Sufis held to be the greatest of ills," and know that we are intimately concerned "in the stupendous adventure of the Universe." In a suggestive passage we are led to realise that only in the spirit of love and service can men find that supreme happiness which makes the mystery of existence bearable. "Life, the Spirit of Life, invites our love—a love industrious and courageous—and it is in generous and disinterested response to this invitation that man's happiness consists. 'The joy of the true lover is to serve him that he loveth.' To love life in this sense, with a love which gives but does not grasp, which co-operates eagerly and passionately in the hard and painful work that life must do, is the exact antithesis of loving 'the world.' It makes the man who has it, whether he dig the earth or search the stars, a partner in the business of the Universe; a voluntary instrument for the self-expression of the strong Spirit which is behind the appearance of things."

THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

In the course of an instructive article on "Capital Punishment: the Case for Abolition," in the Nineteenth Century, Mr. A. F. Schuster reminds us that "in Germany, before the introduction of a universal Criminal Code for the whole of the Empire, capital punishment had been abolished in Saxony, Bremen, Oldenburg, and Anhalt. A proposal for striking it out of the new Criminal Code was passed by the North German Reichstag by 118 votes to 81. This proposal was, however, thrown out by the federated governments by 127 to 119. Up to the end of last year the trend of public opinion in Germany would appear to have been all in favour of the retention of the death penalty, but a reaction seems to have then set in, and an agitation in favour of its abolition was started in the newspapers. It has been abolished in Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, most of the Swiss Cantons, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Maine of the U.S.A., Portugal, Roumania, Venezuela, Brazil, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica. Lastly, do not let us forget San Marino. No one has been executed in Belgium since 1863, or in Finland since 1826. In Russia for nearly two centuries the death penalty has not been applied except in cases of political crimes."

A SCHOOL FOR MOTHERS.

A very satisfactory and encouraging report has been issued by the North St. Pancras School for Mothers, at the conclusion of their first year's work. There can be no question as to the usefulness of the school and the valuable service it is rendering to the community, if only in attacking those "citadels of prejudice and superstition" which the ignorant mother so jealously defends. It seeks to work in harmony with other existing institutions, religious and social, which deal with the allied problems of character, education, public health, and poverty, recognising that no one institution in itself can provide a remedy for the social evils of our time, or pretend that it is the only one that counts.

* * *

The problem of poverty presents the greatest difficulties of all, and causes most distress to the workers, but it is realised that it cannot be ignored or shirked, so important is its bearing on every question considered at the School for Mothers. The visits of the lady superintendent and her assistant to homes in the neighbourhood have revealed some sad facts. Nothing is overlooked which is of the slightest importance in the treatment of the child, not even the condition of the saucepan—a vital matter in "many homes in Kentish Town, where one saucepan has to be used for everything." It is necessary in order that this splendid work may be extended that all who sympathise with it should help in some way, if not by means of personal assistance or donations, by sending parcels of clothing, or toys, tea biscuits, sugar, &c., to provide a little, good cheer for the mothers and elder children while the babies brought up for inspection are undressed. Such gifts will be gratefully received at the Mothers' and Babies' Welcome, 4, Rhyl-street, Malden-road, N.W.

A MODERN GREEK HERO.

In his address on the war in the Balkans delivered at the Ancoats Hall, Manchester, last Saturday, Professor R. M. Burrows referred to the remarkable part played by Venezelos in directing Greek foreign policy which has resulted in the fusion of Greece and Bulgaria at this crisis. "The most interesting figure in Europe to-day," said Professor Burrows, "is Venezelos. A Cretan revolutionary of advanced views in home politics, possessed of the most simple and democratic address and a kind and gentle smile, he is a man who has handled the rifle and been out on the mountains not many years ago. He is still a man of iron, and has won his way to power in a nation so excitable as Greece not by currying to popular favour or by making attractive promises, but by taking a strong and stern line on every question before the country. In appearance, and it seems in character, he is curiously like Pericles, who has come down to us in the bust of Cresilas in the British Museum and in the pages of Thucydides and Plutarch. It speaks well for Greece, and augurs well for the part it will play in the coming struggle, that such a man should in two successive elections have swept the polls of a manhood suffrage electorate."

THE MEANING of CHRISTIANITY.

By the REV.
FREDERICK A. M. SPENCER.
Cloth, 7/6 net. (Inland Postage, 4d.)

"The Meaning of Christianity," by the Rev. Frederick A. M. Spencer, is an attempt to give the principles of a Christian Theology more in accord with the thought and practical idealism of the present age. It is an important contribution to theological reconstruction which every reader of the INQUIRER should carefully read.

The Times says: "In an able chapter on Christ, in which, rejecting the traditional Christology, Mr. Spencer recovers its main values in a synthesis which includes both the Athanasian and the Unitarian doctrine. . . . It is the book of a thoughtful man."

The Irish Weekly Mail says: "The book is the outcome of a wide learning in patristic theology, a careful study of modern psychology and historical criticism, and much philosophical reflection."

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By FREDERICK W. HACKWOOD.

With 27 Illustrations.
10/6 net. (Inland Postage 5d.)

This is a long-delayed biography of an interesting public character, authoritatively compiled from the family's private papers. William Hone was the writer on popular antiquities who compiled those entertaining miscellanies, "The Every Day Book," "The Year Book," and "The Table Book." He was bookseller, patriot, and social reformer; a journalist and political satirist; the friend of Charles Lamb, George Cruikshank, and other notabilities of the day. As a philanthropist he was, whilst in constant monetary difficulties himself, the ready friend and courageous defender of those whom he found in need of human sympathy and assistance. Sometime a Rationalist and unbeliever, he afterwards became a fervid Christian. Impelled by the strong sense of liberty and justice which characterised him, he became a historic figure as the vindicator of the freedom of the Press, standing his trial on three separate charges, in which he conducted his own defence, and procured each time a verdict of acquittal from three juries successively, and in spite of adverse judges. Though his life was one of never-ending struggle with misfortune, his indomitable industry was never relaxed, nor his philanthropy slackened by his own private cares.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Anglo-German Understanding Conference was inaugurated in the Guildhall on Wednesday by a speech of welcome by the Lord Mayor, which had in it the true ring of international friendship. "War does good to nobody," he declared, "except those who make instruments of destruction and tailors who make uniforms." The German's love for the Fatherland, he suggested, might be extended so as to cover the thought of the "Cousin Land." Subsequently Sir Frank Lascelles entered a plea for the frank and tolerant recognition of real differences in government, methods of education, and daily habits of life between the two nations. These differences, he believed, would continue to exist, but they were perfectly compatible with mutual regard and respect, and formed no bar to the establishment of friendly relations founded upon familiar knowledge and sincere esteem.

* * *

DR. SCHUSTER, who spoke in the name of the German community in London, stated that any disturbance of friendly relations would mean ruin to them. The aims and ideals of one country were not inconsistent with the vital interests of the other. But in view of the mistaken ideas which still prevail on this subject, and recent inflammatory speeches emphasizing the probability of war, he maintained that the conference in which they were engaged, so far from being unnecessary, was amply justified. There was still a great deal of uphill work before them if they desired to establish a good understanding between the two countries. He ridiculed the idea that the men "who want to grab everything and to fight everybody" were ever likely to have a voice in the counsels of the German nation. To the German Emperor and the German statesmen the idea of provoking war for the purpose of territorial gain was as abhorrent as it was to the minds of German citizens.

THE letter from the pen of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on Foreign Policy and Christian Ethics, which appeared in our columns on October 19, has been received with deep gratitude in many quarters. We are glad to hear that it is to be reprinted for distribution. Possibly some of our readers, while conscious that Mr. Wicksteed was writing out of deep conviction, felt that his words about the hideous barbarism in Persia were too strong. Professor Brown's pamphlet, "The Reign of Terror in Tabriz," which has just reached us, will go far to dispel any such comfortable delusion. His narrative is in itself a terrible indictment, but it is accompanied by a series of ghastly photographs which are never likely to be forgotten by those who have once seen them. The pamphlet, which costs sixpence, may be ordered from the publishers, Messrs. Taylor, Garnett, Evans & Co., Blackfriars-street, Manchester, or Messrs. Luzac & Co., 46, Great Russell-street, W.C.

IT is reported that the actors of the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play are about to visit Palestine in order to give a performance on the traditional site of Calvary. The object of the enterprise is to secure a set of cinematograph films, which are to be withheld from the ordinary market and reserved for religious work. We hope that the report is untrue. With all the attempts to express the wonder and adoration of simple hearts in sacred drama and song we have hearty sympathy. But this is something different. It is not the natural expression of religious faith, but melodramatic mechanism. Devices of this kind reveal a growing want of confidence in the spiritual power of religion. There is no reason why they should not be worked with admirable success, so far as crowded audiences are concerned, by a syndicate of atheists.

THE Deanery of Durham seems a fitting culmination to Canon Hensley Henson's career. It has the dignity of a bishopric, without the necessity of the gifts of conciliation and management which it is often so difficult for men of strong and independent mind to exercise. The drawback of the appointment is that it takes him from the pulpit, and especially from the pulpit in London, at the zenith of his powers. The Church of England has not been rich in preachers in recent years, and Canon Henson, with his incisive thought, his clear-cut sentences, a wide literary culture and, when the occasion demands it, a flame of noble moral passion, has been among the few in the front rank. His position both at St. Margaret's and the Abbey will be a difficult one to fill, and it is a matter of public concern, far more than in the case of most ecclesiastical appointments, that a right choice should be made.

LORD PEEL, whose death was announced last week, unlike many men born in the Parliamentary purple, added lustre to his name. He was Speaker of the House of Commons during a stormy period which taxed his powers of firmness and patience to the full. When he retired it was felt on all hands that he had maintained the dignity of his office and enhanced its reputation for impartiality. But by many people he will be remembered best for his devotion to the cause of licensing reform during the later years of his life. He was chairman of the Licensing Commission which was appointed in 1896, and subsequently identified himself strongly with the opposition to the creation of a perpetual interest in a terminable licence. In many other ways outside the turmoil of politics, as chairman of the Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery, a Trustee of the British Museum, and chairman of the Council of Toynbee Hall, to mention only a few of his activities, he was a noble servant of the public good.

FATHER TYRRELL.*

GEORGE TYRRELL once wrote:—"The only infallible guardian of truth is the spirit of truthfulness." His own autobiography was evidently written under that guardianship. Throughout it there reigns a spirit of truthfulness so absolute, so detached, so uncompromising, that it succeeds in realising and revealing the most elusive of all subjects—one's self. We may perhaps credit most autobiographers with the purpose of a sincere exposure of themselves. But how seldom we can allow ourselves to be persuaded that the purpose has been achieved. The mist of self interferes both to obscure and to idealise the picture. In TYRRELL there was practically no mist of self. Those of us who knew him most intimately felt the indescribable charm of that selflessness. The clearness of the atmosphere through which we felt him impressed us at times with a sense of awe. We were almost afraid of its terrible transparency. And then, again, the sunny radiance of it would fill us with a kind of intoxicating joy. Yet we felt of him on this very account what we were not forced to feel of many other friends, that we could never know him fully, that he would still have surprises for us. Most men quite unconsciously form for themselves what we may call an outward character, a habitual attitude in which they front the world. It leaves upon others the impression of a harmony which need not, and often does not, correspond with such harmony as they may have attained within. TYRRELL gave you no such help, or rather set up no such hindrance, to your knowing him. The whole complexity of the man was laid bare to your knowledge. Naturally, you could not take it in all at once, and it might have perplexed and baffled you had it not been for the extraordinary simplicity of attraction by which he held all who knew him. Meanwhile he was inexhaustible, and all were free of the source.

But the very spirit of this complex life, its harmonising and determining feature, was the spirit of truthfulness. He could see himself with more detachment than the shrewdest of his friends. Never did letters reveal so much of their writer as TYRRELL'S. Every thought came to you in its characteristic mood. It was never the mere abstraction of an intellect to the secret of whose processes you were admitted. It was the revelation of the soul in some mood of battle—exultation, or perplexity, or stark, grim earnestness—with and for truth. And the first-comer was as free of this revelation as the oldest friend. Yet it is necessary again to insist that in him the spirit of truthfulness was but the expression of something deeper, a complete unconsciousness of self as a natural spontaneous force of exclusive claim. He seemed to feel the claim of every other personality as if it were his own. There was in him a power of instinctive rebuke of any exaggeration of such claims, a rebuke which you felt was motivated not by their threatened encroachment on himself but by their denial of impersonal or rather super-personal justice. He had nothing to say to the braggart or the tyrannous or the smugly self-satisfied. But it would have been difficult, I think, even for them to escape the rebuke of TYRRELL'S dazed silence, of the silence of a man who to the simplest questioner would reveal everything that was in him. He opened and shut as naturally as a flower at day's coming or departure. And the sun that made his day was not simply superficial friendliness, but a felt sincerity, the spirit of truthfulness, in others.

I.

I have dwelt on this spirit of truthfulness in TYRRELL because it is the key to all his power as a seeker in the field of religion. And he was always a seeker. He does not spare to tell us of all the accidental and almost trivial motives that pushed him into the Church of Rome. They were there, no doubt, and in the perfect simplicity of his self-revelation he recalls them for us after a space of twenty years. In the mere telling, where numbers count, they may seem to dwarf the importance of the one motive which was really urgent—the desire of sincerity, reality, depth, in the religious life. In a religious order such as the Society of Jesus, he thought to discover this personal exactingness of the religious life. His first disillusion came with the discovery that here as elsewhere, exactingness itself had been made conventional, easy, as unexacting as possible. It was in this mood that the critical turn of his intellect found, of necessity, its opportunity. We can see how, if the period of his parochial ministry at St. Helen's had been prolonged, the ardour of his mystical-intellectual interest in religion might have been mitigated, to the great loss of mankind. And to the end the same quest of truth possessed him. The more elusive it became, the more determinedly and courageously he pursued it. Yet he knew throughout all the long quest that he had his reward, that the object of his pursuit was among the things that in being sought is most surely found.

And, again, he was among the few seekers in the religious field who are able to resist the temptations of compromise. His brief phase of "mediating Liberalism" was the least characteristic in his whole career, and his letters show how, even while it lasted, he was always, perhaps not with full consciousness, trying to escape from it as from a yoke which he felt to be irksome and, in some obscure sense, degrading. And he quickly broke away from "Mediating Liberalism," because he felt it was an instance of what Miss Petre admirably describes as "a pose in systems, betrayed by the incompatibility of one idea with another." It seemed to him, in later years, even more dangerous to the cause of religion than uncompromising traditional orthodoxy. The latter, for many minds, need not involve the least sacrifice of a perfect inner sincerity. The former had, at least, an insidious tendency to sap such sincerity. TYRRELL had some hard things to say of the cramping effect of the monastic life upon the minds which were formed exclusively under its system. But it may be doubted whether the development of a mind so naturally free and fearless as his own was not actually furthered by the conditions of that life. Not to speak of the bracing effect of having to fight one's way to intellectual independence, there is a positive advantage for the naturally independent mind in the absence of those conditions of the world of action which suggest unreal and momentary working compromises, and so tend to arrest altogether the intellectual process.

II.

It was, at any rate, this uncompromising sincerity which formed the chief element in TYRRELL'S spiritual equipment. As might be expected, it gave a real consistency to his whole life-work. He entered the Roman Church with the conviction that it represented the largest area of Christian religious experience, that it represented also the richest depths attained by that experience as a whole. He did not deny that Protestantism had penetrated certain aspects of religious experience with an even greater earnestness and intensity. But it was unnecessarily partial and limited in its spiritual sympathies, and even its deepest reading of life failed to satisfy by reason of a certain hardness, angularity, want of humane-ness in its general temper. The Roman Church then had preserved the fullest and richest witness to the wholeness of the Christian life. From that faith he never wavered till the end. He began naturally by finding the relation of necessary instrument and most adequate result between the Roman system and Roman religion. Otherwise, he would not have sought refuge in the Roman Church at all. But he speedily found himself dissatisfied with, even instinctively antipathetic to, much in the system as represented by the religious society to which he belonged. The earlier portion of his Roman career was one long struggle to overcome that instinct, as faithless and unworthy. He has told us the incidents of that struggle in one of the most self-unsparring revelations ever written. A certain irony plays about the narrative which seems to relieve the struggle of its grim, patient earnestness. But to the discerning reader that irony but heightens the effect. It is the crowning evidence of the bitterness of disillusion and failure which brought the first period of TYRRELL's Roman career to a close.

Already, when that narrative was written, another period had begun. He had come to distinguish more clearly between the heavenly treasure and the earthly vessel which contained it. We may see in the frequency of that image throughout all his later writings how completely the idea which it represented had seized him. He no longer believed that the Roman system, hardened by the interacting forces of its own tradition and of the revolutionary Europe in which it was isolated into an instrument of the most coercive authority, could adequately minister to a world born into a new life the religious heritage which its own past had created. He saw that the military methods of the Society which he himself knew most intimately had become the ideal of the ruling Church, that its temper was increasingly the temper of ecclesiastical authority everywhere. Yet he did not lose that faith which first drew him to Rome. The completeness of the tragedy, indeed, was that the fulness of the Christian heritage was in her intractable hands. He looked round actual Christendom in despair of finding a less unworthy vessel for the treasure, of finding hands more worthy to commend the wine of life to the lips of the new age. If Rome had become authority incarnate, authority impotent through its naked self-assertiveness, Protestantism on the other hand had lost the very idea of authority. It had split up into groups which were not even national, whose accidental contours were continually changing and shifting. It still retained the treasure in dribblets, but the fulness of the traditional stream, broken into a thousand tiny rivulets, was fast losing itself in the sands. And it was just in this new, eager world that the powerful momentum of a tradition which represented all the past gains of the human spirit was so necessary. So TYRRELL fought on obstinately for the conciliation of authority and spiritual liberty, to persuade his own Church of the merely ministerial nature of authority, to induce her to take account of the spirit-born life which her authority was meant to discipline and cherish, which it was actually rebuking and stifling. From 1900 to 1907 he laboured fiercely and even hopefully for that end. With the appearance of the Encyclical "Pascendi" his hope began to die away. He turned often in thought to the English Church, attracted not merely by a sympathy that was in his blood, but by the fact that that Church had always, with whatever confusion, cherished the two essential principles of liberty and authority. But he would have used Anglicanism, not as a harbour of refuge from the storm that had vexed himself so sorely, but as a living witness to the only conditions under which the integral tradition of Christianity might be preserved. Yet with his clear insight he knew that it was all in vain. He had faced the certainty that a religious revolution was necessary, that the old system of authority must perish of its own perverseness and obstinacy, before the treasure it had been set to guard and minister could be released for the spiritual nourishment of the new time. His last book was the worthy close to a career at once so consistent and so troubled. For it was the final affirmation of the faith in which he had set out on his religious wanderings. And it was also the recognition of the conditions of keeping that faith to which all the vicissitudes of his Odyssey had compelled him. It was a final act of faith in Roman religion as the completest tradition of Christian life. It was the reluctant recognition that the Roman system must perish or be transformed if that tradition was to be saved and reconstituted for the modern world.

If TYRRELL had been capable of thinking about himself, he might have felt in those last years that his life had been a failure. It was another instance of his temperamental selflessness that he never came to feel permanently the oppression which the sense of failure brings. Incidentally he suffered much, suffered terribly. But there was always with him the conviction that there had been a work to do, and that he had done his best to be equal to it. He was right. He will be the greatest force in forming the religious thought and life of the near future throughout every section of Christendom. And his autobiography and the Life which Miss PETRE has written with such skill, faithfulness, and splendid courage, will be certainly not the least precious revelation of his spirit to a grateful posterity.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

KNOWING THE GIFT OF GOD.*

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

"Jesus answered and said unto her, If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee . . ."—JOHN iv. 10.

THERE is hardly ground for wonder that in reading the account of the interview by the well at Sychar, our thoughts are concentrated upon the words of Christ, and that we do not linger long upon the attitude of the woman whose queries called them forth. For Christ's reported words on this occasion are certainly amongst the richest and the most profound of religious utterances that ever fell from human lips, and when they were spoken the deepest conviction of the religious consciousness had obtained, at length, fitting expression. As Renan once said, Jesus pronounced then the truth upon which will rest the edifice of eternal religion. "He founded then the pure worship of all ages, of all lands—that which all elevated souls will practise until the end of time. Not only was his religion on this day the supreme religion of humanity, it was the absolute religion; and if other planets have inhabitants endowed with reason and morality, their religion cannot be different from that which Jesus taught by the well of Jacob." Renan's is not an exaggerated estimate. But if we reflect upon the incidents of the narrative, these will strike us as only less remarkable than the utterance itself. We need not here discuss how far the occurrence is, in the strict sense, historical. For the present purpose it is allowable to take the account which has come down to us in the Gospel tradition. The circumstances which are there described are, indeed, very different from what we might have anticipated. A principle of such deep and lasting import we should have expected would have been originally announced to an assembly which would have been deemed worthy of it; we should have imagined that a teacher who could appeal to multitudes would have reserved the greatest thing he had to say for some special opportunity when he could have touched the mind of the community, and would have been certain to win response. But no! It was in quite an ordinary place, and to quite an unimportant person, that the supreme declaration of his life was made. In the first place, the recipient of the stupendous truth was a Samaritan woman, a daughter of the people who seemed to the Jews little better than pagans in their beliefs and idolaters in their worship. And, in the second place, the woman herself appears to have been ignorant and illiterate, insusceptible to an idea beyond the trivial details of the moment, quite incapable of grasping a conception which had to do with the nature of God and of the relationship of God to man. Observe the attitude she adopts throughout these memorable scenes! She is perfectly oblivious of the real grandeur of the situation; she betrays not the smallest sign that she is aware of anything unusual going on. Here was Jesus speaking to her, in his wonderfully figurative way, of the "living water," and her prosaic mind takes him to be referring to some device by which she shall be saved the trouble of coming with her pitcher to the well! And, then, with a look, as we may suppose, of tender pathos, the master exclaims, "Oh, if you only knew the gift of God, and who it is that is now speaking to you!" But she does not know, and, unmoved still, she shoulders her burden and trudges home, informing her friends simply that she has seen one whom she had taken to be a fortune-teller, and never dreaming that some of the most momentous words in human history had been spoken to her, and to her alone.

"If thou knewest the gift of God!"—to each one of us in the chequered course of our individual lives, no less than to communities of us in our associations for common ends, how often might not that admonition be addressed? To have had a golden opportunity in your hands and to have let it slip away; to have had a messenger of divine truth pleading with you and never to have recognised the value either of him or of his message; to have accounted it just a commonplace, uneventful time when all around you sacred revelations of heaven were happening—few sadder experiences are there than these, and yet, probably, few that are more frequent. "God is not dumb, that He should speak no more." Aye; we are ready enough to repeat that dictum, and to accede to it as a general abstract proposition. But if, even in the silence of private contemplation, conscience challenged us to vindicate its truth by reference to actual concrete instances, how many of us are there who would care to respond to the call, or who would be assured that, in doing so, the safe and solid ground of fact was beneath our feet?

Perhaps, in one sense, there is more excuse for want of spiritual insight in our case than in the case of the men and women of the early centuries. Never were the stress and strain of existence so acutely felt as now. Most of us seem to be hastening through the years weighted with the consciousness that more is being exacted of us than we can ever properly accomplish—more work than it is possible for us to get through, more responsibility than it is possible for us to meet, more anxieties than it is possible for us to bear—until human life is fast threatening to resolve itself into a ceaseless pursuit of the things that are destined to remain undone. "What shelter to grow ripe is ours, what leisure to grow wise?" I have no intention of suggesting reasons for lament that we are born into an excessively busy world. It may be—I think it is—a source of happiness and moral security that we have each of us more than enough of work to fill our waking hours. It may be that modern life is saved from despondency and morbidness through the accumulating multiplicity of its occupations. But, however that may be, certain it is that, in the continual whirl of routine employment, little opportunity is afforded for reflective estimation of the worths and values of reality, or for appreciating the privileges we enjoy by being called into a universe so grand and marvellous as this, so teeming with tidings of the highest and noblest significance. Wayward creatures, as we usually become, of the passing moment, we are so absorbed in acquiring the means of living that we rarely reach the consciousness of what it is to live. And were some great teacher to meet us casually on the roadside of our daily routine, and to speak to us there of the living water that satisfies the soul's thirst—why, I imagine, we should nearly all of us follow the example of the woman of Samaria, and, conceiving that we were in the presence of an eccentric intruder, proceed uninterruptedly with our tasks. "We sit up at night," says George Eliot, "to read about St. Francis; but whether we should be glad for anyone at all like him to call on us the next morning is quite another affair."

Yes; we are, for the most part, but dull prosaic men, afraid, as a rule, to trust our higher intuitions lest we should thereby fall the victims to illusions. We nurture ourselves on the grey monotony of utilitarian ideas, and project their darkening shadow over the rich and varied poetry of the universe. Yet, in spite of ourselves, we are forced, now and again, at least, to lift from our eyes the veil of habit we have thus woven, and to see things as we are not otherwise wont to see them. Who of us, when we meditate in some still hour, fails to be conscious of there having been stages of our experience in which we have been the recipients of gifts, the knowledge of which, in the words of the psalmist, is "too wonderful" for us? These crises of our being, not necessarily eventful ones so far as the outward conditions of our lot are concerned, have been, nevertheless, supreme epochs in our mental history, periods of the soul's awakening to the reality of spiritual things. "There are in our existence," declares Wordsworth, "spots of time that with distinct pre-eminence retain a renovating virtue." It is a truth, that, which human experience attests with a persistency not to be gainsayed. I am thinking now chiefly of ordinary lives, such as the majority of us lead. But well-nigh any biography of a personality that has influenced the mind and heart of his fellows will illustrate unmistakably and vividly what I mean. It was, for example, a great moment in the life of Plato, when he heard from the lips of those who had been present in the prison, of the way in which Socrates had spent his last hours on earth—of how he had spoken to them quietly of his anticipations of what was in store for the soul; and then, in the calm assurance that no evil can ever befall a good man, either here or elsewhere, had gone cheerfully forward to explore the future. It was a great moment in the life of Dante when he, meeting Beatrice with her two companions, seemed, as he tells us, to touch "the very limits of beatitude." Beatrice passed away on the threshold of her womanhood, but the glorified image of her gracious gentleness and virtue became for him the protecting guardian of his wandering years, and the testimony of their fruition in the years which were yet to come. It was a great moment in the life of Newton when the idea of gravitation first flashed across his mind, and he realised the subtle bond of connection by which planets and suns were linked together, and formed into one vast material system. Like Kepler, he must have felt then, if he did not exclaim, "O God, I am thinking Thy thoughts after Thee!" It was a great moment in the life of Wordsworth when, returning home from that night of merriment, "the morning rose in memorable pomp," glorious as e'er he had beheld, and "the solid mountains shone, bright as the clouds, grain-tinctured, drenched in empyrean light," and "in the meadows and the lower grounds was all the sweetness of a common dawn." Is it surprising that "to the brim" his heart was full, that though he made no vows, vows were yet made for him; and that he felt himself then a "dedicated spirit";—felt himself, in other words, consecrated to a service in which it was bliss itself to participate?

These, I repeat, were great moments in the spiritual experience not merely of individuals but of mankind. But we should misinterpret them wholly, we should lamentably fail to appreciate their significance, were we to set them down as abnormal episodes, as phases of consciousness having no parallel, no counterpart, in the humbler, more familiar, paths which you and I frequent. They touch the deepest chords of our nature, and they raise within us the surer response, just because they come so near to what we ourselves live through. The world has had, indeed, and can have, only one Plato. But have we not all of us been taught, like him, at some time or another, how calmly and manfully pain and suffering can be borne, and with what firm trust in eternal goodness death can be faced, by those to whom he has been but little more than a name? Why, the scene in Shepperton Vicarage, where Milly Barton is saying farewell to her little children, and bidding the eldest of them to love and comfort their father, falls in no way short of the beauty and the heroism that characterise the story of the last acts of Socrates. The world has had, and can have, only one Dante; but how many countless lives have scanned the heights of duty, and realised the sacredness of things divine, through coming under the influence of a love such as that which hallowed his? The ministering angels, whom no genius will immortalise, become, quite unknown to themselves, the best part of our being—a softening, restraining, inspiring ideal, the worthiest and the most cherished of our possessions.

Who is there on this earth who has not Hidden deep in his heart a picture, clear or faint,
Veiled, sacred, to the outer world forbidden,
O'er which he bends and murmurs low,
—"My Saint."

The world has had, and can have, only one Newton. But many and many a "lad of parts," as the Scotch Dominie called George Howe, after struggling with the difficulties and impediments that have stood in the way of his acquiring the rudiments of intellectual culture, has felt that self-same thrill of joy when some scientific principle has at last become clear to him, and he is enabled for the first time to grasp one of the root ideas on which the constitution of things is based. The world has had, and can have, only one Wordsworth; but who would have repudiated more indignantly than he the notion that he had any title to peculiar privilege, or any monopoly of that conscious kinship with the majesty, the loveliness, and the serenity of nature, which formed the theme and the burden of his song? Rather was his message precisely the opposite:—

There's not a man

That lives, who hath not known his godlike hours,
And feels not what an empire we inherit As natural beings in the strength of nature.

No; the great moments of spiritual experience are in no sense reserved for the rare and lofty minds that lead the march of human progress; such moments come no less to the men and women who make up the community of what George Eliot used to be fond of describing as that of "the commonplace people." The truth is, nothing is really commonplace for the soul that is alert to the treasures it may see, or for the heart that beats with love towards those who need its love. Here in the thick and turmoil of manhood's labour, here where the most terrible trials come and the battle between good and evil is waging hottest, here in the midst of the ordinary work, the ordinary society, of the world, are to be found all the pathos and the poetry, all the innocent happiness and the unspoken sorrow, all the drama and the tragedy, that show the truths of life to be divine and the meaning of them great.

"There's not a man that lives who hath not known his god-like hours." No man, certainly, who looks on human existence seriously, and brings to its duties a genuine earnestness and thoughtful sincerity. But—and herein consists the problem we have before us—untold thousands of individuals may have such god-like hours and yet be unaware of their god-like character.

Sometimes, indeed, the absence of recognition is due to conscientious reasons which call not for blame, but rather for consideration and respect. The man who has ceased to believe in a Divinity that shapes our ends has parted unquestionably with many things. But I doubt whether any deprivation he will suffer can be severer than the complete change of mental disposition towards the world and its experiences which that loss carries in its train. He comes into being dowered with a multitude of gifts which he has never earned and for which he can never return equivalent—an intelligence, before which nature lies as an open book with all the splendour and glory of her forms and colours, of her order and harmony; a heart, in which the tenderest chords of love may be awakened and towards which the sweetest affections may flow in response; a conscience, which may spring forth in joyful alacrity to the imperative of duty, and a will that may execute its high behests. And for him there is no alternative but to accept all these as a matter of course, as though they were his right and due, legacies to which he is entitled, whilst in truth he has no claim whatever upon them, seeing that they have been presented and not won, that they have been bestowed and not acquired, and that in relation to them he is a recipient and a debtor. To freely participate in the treasures of existence and yet to be debarred from any sense of gratitude for them, to go through the years and take what they have to offer as though it were one's lawful inheritance, that, in such a case, will be an inevitable condition of mind, but no one can say that it has not a sad and sombre cast, as compared with the emotions of a soul to whom God is a reality and God's "grand prodigality" no idle phrase.

Where there is no quieting perception of a divine beneficence it is, of course, futile to bewail the spiritual impoverishment that must of necessity ensue. Towards an omnipotent matter, "blind to good and evil, and reckless of destruction, rolling on its relentless way," no rational mind can harbour feelings of thankfulness or gratitude. Ah! but it is not, as a rule, honest doubt or convinced unbelief that robs us of the consciousness that might be ours. In these hurrying days religion itself tends to degenerate more and more into a mere matter of mechanical habit and convention, and in our anxiety to preserve at all costs its outward observances, we are perpetually emptying it of its inner meaning and essence. On every side of us we see the outcome of this fatal and ruinous error. We see it in the apathy toward serious thought and serious duties; we see it in the disregard of the ideal aspects of nature and of life; we see it in the craving for sickly excitement and vapid amusement; we see it in the unconcern for those high principles and moral responsibilities in devotion to which nations, no less than individual men, thrive and prosper. We are fast losing the sense that the greatest, the loveliest, the most enduring subjects of thought and feeling lie not in strange and unusual occurrences, but in the ordinary, the universal, things of human experience. Hence the common and perennial blessings—the beauty spread far and wide over the face of the earth—in the silence of the hills, and the stillness and repose of woodland solitudes, in the flowers of the field and in the clouds that chase one another across the sky;—the simple joys and delights that permeate the home circle; the touch of human heart with human heart, so quick, so sure, so healing; these—typical, though they be, of the lavish provision that has been made for our being, and precious, as they are, to every one of us beyond compare, we seldom dream of referring to the source from which we say they come. They form the steadfast background, the very mainstay of our lives, but rarely do we discern in them a manifestation of divine goodness, or look upon them as ways in which God is beseeching us to commune with Him in spirit and in truth. He, indeed, exacts not our thanksgiving; to picture Him as "for ever hearkening unto his self-commanded laud" would be to repeat the crudity of pagan worship. But indebtedness, gratitude, thankfulness—this is a state of mind valuable, so far as we are concerned, for its own sake, and without which we do not reach the full stature of men.

If thou knewest the gift of God! The woman of Samaria did in time attain that knowledge. She makes mention of "our father Jacob," and, in this instance, she was a truer daughter of Jacob than she had herself any idea of. Long before, in a strange place, her ancestor had once awakened to find that God had been beside him, though he knew it not, and so now she, after Christ had left her, came to realise in whose presence she had been and to gain some insight perhaps into the message he had given her. With us, too, what happens is, not seldom, very similar. We seem often singularly incapable of estimating aright contemporary events and contemporary personalities. How frequently, for example, have men and women of genius been misjudged and ignored by those amongst whom they laboured! How many poets have "learned in suffering what they taught in song," how many thinkers and scientists have lived a life of lonely, silent struggle, and passed away before appreciation came! In later ages we maintain their houses for a show, whilst formerly the living inmates could hardly keep the wolf from their doors. We build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, whilst our predecessors slew them. And is it not largely parallel with respect to our attitude towards the gifts of God? We know them only feebly whilst they are actually present; we come more readily to know them often when they have retreated into the past. "The Past," it has been powerfully said, "does not change or strive; like Duncan, after life's fitful fever it sleeps well; what was eager and grasping, what was petty and transitory, has faded away, the things that were beautiful and eternal shine out of it like stars in the night." Through the light of retrospect, we are made aware of the sacred and regenerating influences that have entered into our lives and which have touched our souls to finer issues, although at the time we may, partially, at any rate, have missed their worth and their significance. It is hard for us, indeed, to be fully conscious of the spiritual or ideal aspects of things so long as they are present to eye and ear; the word of life is to some extent hidden in that which our eyes can see and our hands can handle.

'Tis only as they spring to heaven that angels Reveal themselves to you; they sit all day
Beside you, and lie down at night by you,
Who care not for their presence—muse or sleep—
And all at once they leave you, and you know them.

Browning does not mean necessarily that regretful memory is vainly trying to repair the breaches in our past love when that love might have flowed in free unstinted measure. Whilst we are actually living in and through a great affection, it would certainly retard its course and spoil its spontaneity were we to be perpetually exposing its roots in order to see how they are growing. Browning means rather that the conditions of earthly existence, the trifling and superficial details of the passing hour, often loom so prominently in our field of vision, that they half conceal from us what they half reveal, and prevent us from appreciating as we would the inner mind and heart in all their richness and nobility. And so it is that the consecrating touch of death clarifies our insight, and the soul we love rises up vividly before us, in quiet sweetness and beauty. We lose a visible presence; we gain an invisible but very real personality.

To know the gift of God! A church surely may regularly do for its members what the light of retrospect does for each of us at intermittent stages of our individual existence—give, namely, the right focus from which alone the knowledge we are so apt to miss may be securely ours. In the tranquil seasons of worship and reflection, the surface shows may vanish, and the true proportions, the right relations, of things stand forth to view. Such knowledge, it is true, will even then be in part only, but under the shade of holy thought we may learn at least in what a world we live. And then by degrees the deep foundations of life will become manifest to us, and the restful trust that at the centre of nature's endless agitations there subsists the heart of love which we sum up and express in the great name of "Father" will bind us to the mind of Christ.

O Christian men and women, a vital truth was proclaimed by the well of Sychar, when both to Samaritan and to Jew the message was vouchsafed that in knowing the gift of God, Gerizim and Jerusalem could be dispensed with as places of His worship. Do we even now sufficiently realise the magnitude of that message? It involved the relinquishment of the old conception, still so prone to linger on, that a special, unique, exceptional environment is needed for attaining the consciousness of divine solicitude. It involved the abandonment of every artificial means of awakening in man the assurance that he is in the presence of a righteous God. It involved, in short, distinct recognition of the inherent sacredness of the universal and common things of nature and humanity. And I would fain believe that, in the present commemoration, your desire is to register once again allegiance to that supreme principle of Christ's. The enduring features of bygone days are rising before you, through the light of retrospect, in outlines undimmed and clear. A space of fifty years is but a little fragment looked at from the point of view of a church's history, but looked at from the point of view of the individual worshippers it is a long stretch of time. Only too apparent is the difference which less than one-third of that period has entailed. A visible congregation is in front of me, but behind it is gathered a larger invisible congregation, composed of comrades, dear and true, from whom many a look of sympathy seems to cheer us and many a tone of encouragement to speak. If they could but tell us whether they are still thinking any of the thoughts, or cherishing any of the loves, born and fostered in this house of prayer, doubtless it would aid us much. They may not tell us. But though "with silence only as their benediction" they are coming to us now, we may share the assurance of Renan, that for them change of gospel has not accompanied change of world. For to them God was, and is, a Spirit, and to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. And we are theirs, and they are ours—one family still of kindred minds. Here, then, in the time that remains, do you guard the wisdom of life's god-like hours, and commune, no less sincerely than of yore, with the Father who seeth in secret. Suffer not the small things of experience to eclipse the great, nor the hard crust of selfishness to act as a non-conductor of the divine. Thus will you know the gift of God, and Him also who is the author and giver of every good and perfect gift.

For warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee."

THE NEW WESLEYAN CENTRAL HALL.

A CONTRAST.

SIR,—One of the most important events of this year in the sphere of religious activity has been the opening, a few weeks ago, of the new Wesleyan Central Hall, opposite Westminster Abbey.

This magnificent building, whose dome has already become a landmark in central London, is acknowledged by that critical body of opinion, the architectural profession itself, to be the finest work of Classical architecture which has been erected in London since St. Paul's Cathedral—particularly because, apart from mere materials and scale, it possesses the abstract qualities which mark all great architecture, the grouping of masses of building in well-proportioned relation, giving due contrasts of light and shade, projection and recess, all combining to produce a single organic effect when taken as a whole.

The interior scheme of the building is no less imposing in regard to the uses to which it will be put. One's imagination must be struck by the scale of the accommodation, from the tea-room in the basement, where 1,000 persons can be seated at once, through the main staircase with its great sweeping curves, the "Small" Hall and library, each seating 600, and capable of being thrown into one by sliding partitions, the complete series of committee and conference rooms, up to the Large Hall under the dome, seating 2,500, and equally suitable for services, lectures, or concerts.

It is somewhat humiliating to contrast with this splendid achievement the dismal and inadequate character of our own headquarters; familiarity may breed contempt, but more often it breeds indifference; and those of us who constantly spend time at Essex Hall can hardly realise the painful shock of surprise which it produces in the minds of our country friends on their first visit. It will be conceded by everyone that the first essentials of a religious headquarters are that it shall be accessible, conspicuous, and cheerful, so that the work which is carried on there shall be assisted and not impeded by its surroundings. But let us follow the career of our visitor, from the moment when he discovers the prison-like entrance gates, hidden away in a side street, and notes that we carefully display our publications and literature in a cul-de-sac, through which no traffic of any kind ever passes.

The whole building will strike him as profoundly gloomy, the abundance of spiritual light being no doubt held to compensate for the absence of material light, not to speak of sunshine. He will first descend into the depths, and contemplate the absurd cloakroom and lavatory accommodation which is supposed to meet the requirements of several hundred people at once; the narrow passage, deriving daylight at second-hand through the spotted ground glass of the side of the committee room, and leading to the Council room, which boasts only a skylight like that of an early Victorian swimming bath. He will then mount the "grand staircase" to the entrance hall, with its chilly tiles and more spotted glass, and will survey the reading room, where, as often as not, he will be unable to read, as it is occupied by a sub-committee; the general office of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which has also to serve as a committee room, and (like the House of Commons and its members) is quite incapable of holding the executive committee should they all happen to be present at once; and the Secretary's office, which contains at least ten corners, most of which are in complete darkness.

Finally he ascends to a perfect death-trap of a landing and enters the Hall itself, an apartment of the most inconvenient shape, with no proper provision for refreshments except by curtaining off that part of it which also contains the organ, and of a general effect and character which is enough to damp any but the most rampantly enthusiastic "gathering."

His look of pained surprise will, of course, be met by references to the great work which has been done there and the "traditions and associations which have grown up within these walls." To which he would reply justly that Essex Hall is not, and never was, in the least fit for this kind of purpose. It was originally an auction room, converted into a chapel by Lindsey, and again into its present form less than 30 years ago. As for the great work, he would point out that it has been done in spite of and not because of its surroundings; and if these had been brighter and more encouraging the work would have been greater still. One would not, of course, expect that our small group of churches could undertake anything on the grand scale of the Wesleyans. But surely we have learnt by this time that buildings for religious work need not necessarily be dark and dreary? One can imagine the revived impetus and enthusiasm which we should all derive from the creation of a new Essex Hall in some broad main thoroughfare like Kingsway, a building with modern and adequate accommodation for all kinds of organising work, containing not only a large hall of really suitable form, but a publishing department which could challenge the notice of the passer-by, a proper tea-room for refreshments, a comfortable reading room and library, separate rooms set apart for conferences, committees, and office work, and permanent clubrooms for the Laymen's Club and the Women's Club and League.

Are both these pictures too highly coloured? If so, I can only plead that I am myself a constant sufferer under present conditions, and that if one wishes to advocate reform in any sphere of activity, a certain amount of emphasis may be pardonable in view of what others have accomplished in the same sphere.—Yours, &c.,

RONALD P. JONES.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE OF SERVICE.

SIR,—We venture to appeal for the hospitality of your columns in drawing attention to the fact that in these days of widespread interest in child nurture there is no organised attempt on anything like a large scale to meet the needs of the child at a time when it can only be reached through its mother. Eminent authorities are agreed that loss of nutrition during the prenatal period and the first nine months of life can never be wholly made up, i.e., neglect at these periods must necessarily mean a lowered standard of development for the whole nation. The solution of this problem has quite truly been said to be the work of women, and it is to the women of England that we appeal to undertake the efficient mothering of the whole nation. The Women's League of Service has been founded to unite women in a common bond to further the interests of motherhood, and to improve the conditions under which children are brought into the world and under which they exist during the first few months of their lives.

The work is threefold:—

- (a) To feed ill-nourished mothers.
- (b) To befriend and instruct the ignorant.
- (c) To train social workers.

Wherever, therefore, a centre of the League is established a dining-room for expectant and nursing mothers is opened daily at 2 o'clock, providing meals which have been carefully devised by experts; a circle of workers under trained superintendence visit the mothers in their homes; infant consultations, where doctors advise as to the welfare of the babies, are held weekly, and classes to teach the young mothers sewing, cooking, &c., are associated.

We appeal to every woman, high or low, rich or poor, at least to enrol her name as a member of the League by sending it with address and 1s. subscription to the Secretary, Women's League of Service, 31A, Mortimer-street, W. Every woman can thus show her sympathy with the aims of the Society, even if she can afford no more generous gifts of time or money. But more important still are members who will undertake to organise a local centre of the League and to interest their own circle of friends in the work. Centres in London have been in existence for two years, and these should be visited at the dinner hour by any one interested in the scheme. They are 26, Cumming-street, King's Cross; 36, Lisson-street, Marylebone; 188, Blythe-road, Hammer-smith; and 111, Bridge-road West, Battersea. In the report for 1910-11 the statistics of two of the dining-rooms show 5,628 meals served, of which 3,031 were paid for by the mothers themselves at 2d. a meal. The same report shows that the average gain in weight per week of babies whose mothers attended the dinners was 5.3 oz. while the average gain of control babies whose mothers were not so fed was 3.8. A subscription of £1 1s. a year entitles the subscriber to send a mother unable to pay herself to any of the dining-rooms for four months; a subscription of 10s. 6d. gives tickets for two months free dinners. Cards for enrolling members or subscribers can be had on application to the Secretary.

We do not hesitate to appeal most of all to those mothers whose lives and homes are sheltered, and whose babies enter a kind of world surrounded by all that science demands and wealth can procure, reminding them that 30 per cent. of the population in every large town are necessarily underfed.—Yours, &c.,

ANGLO-GERMAN CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Will you permit me to correct an error in your issue of last week. The Anglo-German Understanding Conference at the Guildhall on October 30, and at Caxton Hall on October 31 and November 1, was organised, not by the Anglo-German Friendship Committee, a committee which is no longer in existence, but by a joint committee of the National Peace Council (which body originated the Conference), the British-German Friendship Society and the Associated Councils of the Churches of Great Britain and Germany, and by a corresponding joint committee in Berlin. The Conference was therefore representative of all the bodies working for peace and an understanding in both countries.—Yours, &c.,

THE NATIONAL FEDERATION OF LITERARY SOCIETIES.

SIR,—A more or less notable attempt to remedy the lack of co-ordination of intellectual effort is being made by the National Federation of Literary Societies, which has been formed on a simple basis for the interchange of courtesies, exchange of programmes and lecturers, and other advantages of co-operation, with the object of making more effective, continuous, and permanent the activities of scattered literary and cultural organisations without encroaching upon their individual independence or local sphere of influence.

Professor Gollancz, LL.D., has accepted the Presidency of the Federation, the development of which must largely depend on the union of the numerous local organisations to whom the project appeals, and, as there are many such societies at present unknown to us, we venture to beg the privilege of stating that we hope presidents and secretaries of literary and debating societies up and down the country will communicate with us on their own initiative.—Yours, &c.,

HEROIC POETRY.

English Epic and Heroic Poetry. By W. Macneile Dixon. (Channels of English Literature.) J. M. Dent & Sons. 5s. net.

HAPPY indeed are those students who put themselves to school under Mr. Dixon, for if they learn his lessons they will all be wise and erudite, and not a pedant or dogmatist among them. If this book is the first of the series to be published, I can only say that Mr. Dixon has set a fashion in method of treatment which those who come after will be wise to continue in the succeeding volumes. Here are no narrow assertions, no wearisome attempts at cleverness, no feverish efforts after originality, but the disquisitions of a mind brimful of the subject, and at once discriminating and enthusiastic. It is not too much to say that the opening chapter on "The Idea of Epic" gives one something of the pleasure of a chapter from Montaigne. All the views on the subject are stated, and the writer breaks like sunshine into felicitous quotation. After discussing Ballads and that central figure of our ballads, Robin Hood, who, like Robin Redbreast in the ballads, seems to have been rather a type than any particular individual, he goes on to the noble "Beowulf," a poem prophetic of the temper of the men who were to make so much that is best in English story, a poem grave with the sense of life as a hard task. From the Epic of the warrior we pass to the Epic of a more complex age, when the influence of the religionist, the lover, the woman, are felt, and quotations from Stevenson are most happily used to show how the Epic at this period was weakened by concentrating attention rather on the mood than the act. The self-examination encouraged by religion, the lyrical tendency of love, the influence of woman, cut off from so much of practical life, would all help in this result, but still this particular chapter concludes with a brief but deliciously fresh analysis of Chaucer's "Knight's Tale," as a specimen of what the medieval spirit could embroider on a classic outline when the workman was an artist.

Then follow some pages on Layamon, one of those men whose work is a mixture of legend and history; not an epic, but a mass of epical stuff that has never been worked into complete artistic form. In the crude mass is imbedded the golden ore of such stories as those of Arthur, Lear, Cymbeline, Hengist and Horsa. The romantic Epic culminates in the golden cadences of Spenser, and Mr. Dixon's charming discussion makes us ask, Did Spenser come too late? He believed in romance with a virgin heart, and walked its landscape in white—but already Don Quixote and Falstaff were on their way to the wars. So we come back to the Classical Epic, and once again are conquered, but we fall before a noble hand—that of Milton. Again we pause before that amazing fortitude which undertakes to create for itself a new world of light and darkness, and majestic shapes of nakedness and passion appropriate to each. Again we are silent before the sound of that voice which disdains all lower modes of appeal, but is ever at the pitch of sublimity, and is part of cosmic harmony. After being here on the mount of prayer, to come down to Cowley and some others is to join Comus and his crew. Cowley, I must confess, is a weakness of mine; I love him, but not in epic vein. And I thank the gods that they made Blackmore poetical, not for the sake of his poetry, but because of Johnson's life of him. But still Mr. Dixon does even the honours of the lumber-room gracefully, and afterwards entertains us gleefully with Mock-Heroics, concluding his book with discussions of the narrative poetry of Scott and that terribly worthy person Southey, and Byron whom he loves, and so working down to the Victorians, completes his labour. Heroic poetry—is it passing from literature and from life? This book makes us hope not.

WARFARE IN ENGLAND. By Hilaire Belloc. London: Williams & Norgate. Home University Library. 1s. net.

This little book is a very illuminating and suggestive essay on the strategical topography of England. It endeavours to explain how the efficiency of the armies operating in England depended on the circumventing of natural obstacles, such as rivers, hills, &c., which must necessarily remain the same at all periods. The author discusses the Norman conquest, the different Barons' wars, the Wars of the Roses, and the Civil War. His view is that the same strategical difficulties had to be surmounted in each case, owing to the unchangeable formation of the country, compelling armies to move in certain directions. Many of these theories are convincing, and he certainly shows that some knowledge of military topography is necessary for the proper understanding of history.

The late Frederic Shields is remembered chiefly as the artist whose work for several years was done in the Chapel of the Ascension, Bayswater, so closely associated with the name of Mrs. Russell Gurney. His life has now been written by Mrs. Ernestine Mills, and will be shortly issued by Messrs.

Longmans & Co. In it will be found the story of the early struggles of the artist from the time that he left the St. Clement Danes Charity School at the age of fourteen, to be a ticket writer at five shillings a week, till he achieved distinction as a painter of religious subjects. The narrative is founded on the artist's diaries and family letters, and on the letters of his friends. Among his correspondents were Charles Kingsley, Ruskin, D. G. Rossetti, Sir John Gilbert, G. F. Watts, Ford Madox Brown, and Mrs. Russell Gurney. The book contains numerous illustrations of the artist's early woodcuts and water colours, as well as designs for stained glass, and his latest works in the Church of the Ascension.

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co. will publish shortly a book of devotional readings edited by the Rev. J. M. Connell. The book, in the compilation of which Mr. Connell has received the assistance and advice of many people with special qualifications for the work, will consist of selections from the literature of Christendom since New Testament times, and will be suitable both for private reading and for use as an extended lectionary in churches.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

OF SWALLOWS, AND HOW LOVE CAST OUT FEAR.

THINGS go by contraries a good deal in this world, so possibly that's the reason why the master of Barford village school, a mountainous heavy man, thinks so much about the birds of the air. He'll never fly. The more praise from him for the creatures that do, above all the swallows, those paragons of the wing. Is it in return for his fond thought of them that they, passing over his neighbours' houses, make their habitations by preference under his eaves? He is an enemy to the sparrows, though, because they are enemies of the swallows, raiding their nests, at times, and hurling their helpless babes down on to the ground beneath. So it happened that as I passed one day after school was out, I saw the master belabouring the great holly-hedge, high as his house, with a sixteen-foot pole. "What's up?" I asked. "Sparrows," he replied, as he continued to beat the bushes as though he were birching some gigantic boy. "The little beggars! they attack my swallows. Bought this pole for threepence on purpose to hustle 'em out; there they go! Can you spare a couple of minutes?"

So I turned in at the gate, and he led the way to the school door. As we were going through the porch, "Look up above your head," he said. I looked up. There was a swallow seated on her nest. I could easily have reached her with my hand, but she sat on, inclining her little blue head to keep an eye on us, but satisfied that we meant no harm. "It's her third brood," said the master.

It was towards the end of September last year, and we shall none of us ever forget the summer that seemed as if it would never break up or cool down into autumn. The swallows had taken full advantage of the glorious weather, which was not only congenial to their young, but kept the sky a-hum with gnats and flies. But the tomtit that built its nest in a letter-box scarcely had a livelier habitat than this devoted pair. One quiet holiday month, it is true, had intervened during the nursing of the second brood, but for all the rest of the time sixty or seventy boys and girls tramped in and out daily through the porch, and played with shout and laughter round it, or stood and watched the swallows come and go, feeding their young with an ardour of love that was never exhausted while the light of those long summer days endured.

About St. Swithin's Day during the present year, a pair of swallows selected the lintel of the front door under the verandah for the site of their new home. Experimental buttons of mud appeared in a line along the top of the woodwork, and having thus satisfied themselves that their masonry would stick to the surface they went to work. A pond with clay banks by the roadside a couple of hundred yards away yielded plenty of good building material, and it was a matter of but a few seconds to carry a mud pellet on the beak to lay the foundations of the house. Amongst the bricks were laid strands of hay, which hung down this way and that, but were firmly embedded and served to strengthen the walls. These completed—they formed but a shallow cup—a lining of soft white feathers cast off by the neighbouring fowls was added. Then came one, two, three small fragile speckled eggs. The mother bird was not tied to her duties as a sitting hen is, but would often slip off for a dainty morsel taken on the wing, or for a joyful dash of freedom through the liquid sunshine and air. But she knew how long it was safe to be away, and would fly in and out of her nest indifferent to the people sitting and chatting on the tiles and eating their meals within a few feet of her. But be careful lest you frighten her. One evening I luckily did so with consequences that made me tremble. Not noticing the little black tail poking out over the side of the nest as I came out of the door, I concluded the swallow was away, and raised my hand to feel how many eggs had been laid. To my surprise the bird flew off in a flash. We sat watching for her to return. Half an hour passed, and it was getting late—the eggs would be chilled and all sweet dreams of the little family-to-be would be shattered. Then she came, but turned back abruptly before reaching the nest. Again and again she fluttered in the air until she almost touched the nest, but back came the memory of that terrible Hand, and she turned with fear in her heart and was out of sight in a moment. Meanwhile he, her spouse, was skimming over the fields in the July twilight, and round the house and round and round again, open-mouthed, sweeping up gnats by the score. “Selfish, greedy fellow!” do you say? Not a bit of it. He is thinking all the time of his anxious, timid wife in her dark blue silky gown. He is always so glad when she can venture to leave her post for a few minutes and glide through the air along with him. What a race of excitement it is! What swift shootings up, what swifter divings down, what reckless twists and turns and loops! Yet all so safe. But the life of a swallow, however happy, is something more than a race and a frolic. He knows it. He knows there is a strict limit to the time the eggs may be safely left exposed. All his fatherly hopes lie in those three small speckled pearly things half-hidden in the snowy down. It is high time the little mother returned. Can she have forgotten? He flies up to her and twitters to remind her of the time she has been away. She understands perfectly what he says, and again she ventures up to the edge of the verandah; but the sight of the nest every time brings back to her mind the awesome image of the Hand from which she had fled, and she backs in terror once more. So now he asks her why she is afraid. He flies up to the nest to show her there is nothing amiss. He perches on the bar beside it. She tries, but her heart fails. She is like a nervous child afraid, in spite of motherly coaxings, to step into the sea. Then he perches on a wire fence a few feet from the verandah and twitters until she comes and perches on the wire near him. He twitters and tells her she must go. She moves not. He flutters up to her side, flickers around in the air and touches her, lightly patting her with the tips of his quivering wings until she rises and dares again. Thus an hour and more passes, his anxiety and excitement increasing, her courage returning, little by little, won by his fidelity and love. At last the faithful mate is rewarded. He flies up to the nest and sits beside it, and calls in a pleading ripple, half speech, half song. She flies up, and touches the clay with her feet, and retreats for the last time. Once more he rallies her, tapping her very face and bosom with his wings. He flies; she flies—the spell is broken, the dark fear is gone, she settles on the precious eggs and warms them into life. Perfect love hath cast out fear.

In fulness of time three small jelly-bags, with blind bluish lumps at the end for heads, compete with one another in gaping with their big yellow-rimmed bills and bolting the pellets of gnats which their indefatigable parents bring them every few minutes. Nursed with such care they grow apace—how could they otherwise? Feathers grow, comeliness appears, and the likeness of swallows, until for these blue-jacketed, white-waistcoated young fellows the nest proves all too strait. How little trouble, how little time is needed to learn to fly like a spirit. Father and mother cease to keep watch in their sleep even from the neighbouring bar, and betake themselves to slumber in the chimney at nights. One of the three, the most robust and enterprising, presently finds lodgings outside too, but the pair that remain are inseparable and indistinguishable. Yet where are they now? I know not. Possibly across the channel. In a few weeks they will be thousands of miles away, fly-catching in Spain or Morocco, skimming over the smooth Nile or Ganges, or gone to Jericho. The unbaked mud bowl, like an ancient oil lamp with a white feather for wick, rests over the doorway to serve as an inducement next summer to the parent birds to return; to return to a home they may well love the more because of their brave conquest of fear. Or, it may be, one of their children will remember the downy cot in which he came to life and grew a beautiful feathered thing, and bring his newly-won wife from the far South to a home where she may rest and rear her young in safety, while he glances guardianly in and out of sight or sits at her side and twitters a lullaby. Safe shall she be as the gift on the altar given and guarded by love.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

UNITY CHURCH, ISLINGTON. JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

THE celebrations of the opening of Unity Church, at Islington, which occurred on August 10, 1862, took place on Sunday and Monday, October 27 and 28, 1912. Special services were held on the Sunday, when a former minister, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, officiated in the morning and preached a sermon which is published in our present issue. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks, also a past minister, conducted the services in the evening, and preached on “Be thou faithful unto death”; it was a vigorous appeal for religious fidelity. There were large congregations and happy reunions with old friends.

A commemoration meeting was held on Monday evening in the schoolroom, when there was a very good attendance.

Mr. Alfred Wilson presided, supported on the platform by the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. F. Leyden Sargent, the Rev. Henry Gow, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, Mr. Charles Hawksley, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Miss Helen Bartram, Mrs. Sydney Titford, Mr. Percy Preston and Mr. J. T. Mackey.

After the singing of Emerson's hymn, “We come unto our Father's house,” the Secretary, Mr. F. Leyden Sargent, read letters of congratulation and regret from the Rev. R. J. Campbell, Dr. Drummond, Principal Carpenter, Miss Mary Preston and Mr. Frank Ierson.

Dr. Tudor Jones expressed a most cordial welcome to the two former ministers, Dr. Dawes Hicks and the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, and to the numerous other visitors, among whom were several descendants of the ejected ministers of 1662. Unity Church, he said, had done excellent work, and they were grateful for the divine guidance of the last fifty years. Though beset with difficulties Unity Church was holding its own, and though far from satisfied, the congregation believed that in Islington there was a work for the church in bringing men and women to the worship of God and the service of man, and in helping them to understand the meaning of religion and its power to lift the soul above the sordid cares of earth. That message they would carry to the neighbourhood and seek to make it known to all.

Dr. Hicks, after referring to the inevitable changes in the congregation, spoke of the great development that had taken place during the last fifty years in the attitude of the universities and the orthodox churches in regard to Non-conformists, and strongly emphasised the need for greater readiness to work in harmony with the liberal thinkers and religious workers of the various churches who were in agreement on all matters of fundamental importance.

Mr. Chas. Hawksley, as president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, congratulated the congregation, and expressed the hope that under its present minister greater work would be done in the future.

The Rev. E. Savell Hicks said it was a pleasure and a privilege to be present, and proceeded to speak of the difficulties of carrying on the work of the church in the changing district of Islington, and expressed his belief that the Jubilee Celebrations would make his friends at Unity Church realise their duty afresh, and help them to strive still more earnestly to make the church and its work as dear to others as it was to themselves.

The Chairman called special attention to the history of the congregation, which had been compiled by Mrs. Titford, and was published that evening, and to the special Jubilee Fund, amounting to £678, which had been raised to assist the finance, and to provide funds for the redecoration of the interior of the church, and the installation of the electric light.

Among the other speakers were Mr. Percy Preston, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Miss Helen Bartram, the Rev. H. Gow and Mr. Waters.

Mr. Mackey, as superintendent of the Sunday School, briefly referred to the work amongst the young, and recalled the names of many who had ministered to the needs of the children, during the more than fifty years he had been connected with the church and Sunday school.

Mr. Harold Wade proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman, the cordial reception of which showed how much Mr. Wilson's services are appreciated by his fellow members of Unity Church.

The benediction, pronounced by Dr. Tudor Jones, closed a meeting and celebrations that will remain memorable in the records of Unity Church.

Under the heading, "A Unitarian Church and the Chamberlains," the following reference to Unity Church and its history appeared in the London Letter of the Manchester Guardian on Tuesday, Oct. 29:—

"Unity Church, Islington, has just celebrated its jubilee. This church is one of the oldest Unitarian places of worship in London, and is the successor of a former building in Carter-lane, in the City. The Carter-lane Church dated from 1667, and it is interesting to many to-day because of its connection with the Chamberlain family. Here both Joseph Chamberlain and Frederick Nettlefold acted as Sunday school teachers. The Chamberlains come of an old Nonconformist lineage. They are able to trace their descent to John Spicer, one of the Protestant martyrs in the Marian persecution, who was burned in 1556. The grandson of this John Spicer was William Spicer, vicar of Stone, in Worcestershire, whose daughter Hannah married in 1652 Richard Serjeant, of Kidderminster. Richard Serjeant succeeded his father-in-law as vicar of Stone in 1656, and was one of the ministers to be ejected in the famous disruption of 1662. His eldest daughter was an ancestress of the second wife of the first Joseph Chamberlain, the grandfather of the ex-Colonial Secretary. Among Mr. Chamberlain's sisters is Mrs. William Kendrick, who celebrated her golden wedding—she was married at Unity Church on August 26, 1862—a few days since. Mrs. Sydney Titford, a member of the congregation, who has been compiling a history of Unity Church, has received an interesting letter from Mr. Austen Chamberlain, who sends a subscription of £5 towards the church expenses. "You woke so many reminiscences," writes Mr. Chamberlain, "that I cannot resist your appeal, though I am at the present time hard pressed by other engagements." The Chamberlain family have never relinquished their hold upon Unitarianism. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is still a subscriber to the various charities in connection with the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, and it is at that church that the various members of his family have been married. On leaving Highbury-place, Mr. Chamberlain moved to Birmingham, where he joined a debating society attached to the Church of the Messiah. He has since attributed his success as a public speaker to the practice gained at these debates. It is not generally known that the late Thomas Hornblower Gill—well known as a hymn-writer—was related to the Chamberlains. Among former members of Unity Church are Sir Edward Durning-Lawrence and Sir Roland K. Wilson."

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on Monday, October 28. Mr. Charles Hawksley, president, was in the chair, and among those present were the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, C. Roper, G. Harwood, Dr. Tudor Jones, F. Summers, W. Wooding, A. Pearson, T. E. M. Edwards, W. W. C. Pope, Miss Brooke Herford, Miss Burkitt, Miss E. Lake, Mrs. Bartram, Miss Martineau, Miss Sharpe, Dr. Cyril Greaves, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. A. Wilson, Mr. G. H. Clennell, Mr. Capleton, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. P. Preston, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. L. Chatfield Clarke, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (secretary). After the minutes had been read, Mr. Fellowes Pearson gave a cordial welcome to Mr. Hawksley, on his taking office for a second year as President of the Association. Mr. Hawksley, in replying, said that he was very glad to accede to the request to occupy the chair for a second year, his only stipulation being that he should not be expected to do as much as he had tried to do last year. So far as he could see, however, the work showed no signs of decreasing, rather the reverse, but he hoped to do it to the best of his ability. Mr. Bowie then read the report of the Executive Committee, which dealt with many matters relating to Home Mission work, publications, and other activities, particulars of which have appeared from time to time in our columns. The following passages are, however, of special interest.

THE PIONEER PREACHERS.

The Pioneer Preachers' movement will have been known to members of the Council interested in new methods of reaching the people with the message of a Liberal Christianity. The movement was an outcome of a missionary effort organised by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, minister of the City Temple, in connection with the Liberal Christian League. A number of young men filled with the desire to preach the gospel of the New Theology were gathered together, and a Hostel was established. Here they were trained for missionary work. During the summer months they were sent into the country to hold open-air meetings, and to conduct missions in connection with churches in sympathy with the ideals of the Liberal Christian League. In some of these missions several of our own ministers took an active interest; and suggestions were made in favour of co-operation between the preachers and the Van Mission. The men in the Hostel gradually discovered that work in association with orthodox organisations was beset with increasing difficulties and limitations. Some months ago they accordingly suggested to Mr. Campbell, in view of his approaching retirement, that the Rev. Dr. W. Tudor Jones might be invited to succeed him in the Wardenship. The suggestion was adopted, and Dr. Jones expressed his willingness to become Warden. The men asked also for the recognition of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Arrangements were then made for the transfer of the Hostel and of the Pioneer Preachers' movement to an independent committee. The committee was constituted as follows:—Warden, Dr. W. Tudor Jones; chairman the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; treasurer, Mr. Howard Young; secretary, the Rev. T. P. Spedding; and the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson and Mr. Alfred Wilson. The new committee have resolved on an experimental year's work. Assurances of financial support have already been obtained. The Executive Committee, at their meeting, October 9, passed a resolution of hearty welcome to the Pioneer Preachers, and of congratulation to Dr. Tudor Jones on his acceptance of the wardenship. They trust that the experiment will result in the inauguration of an important and helpful missionary movement among Unitarians and other Liberal Christians. The movement will not involve the Association in any financial liability during the experimental year. During the winter months the Pioneer Preachers will conduct meetings at missions which they established at Amersham, West Ham, and Norwood; also various preaching engagements arranged through the Secretary. An important step has already been taken in the offer of the services of Pioneer Preachers to the London District Unitarian Society for the purpose of carrying on the work of the churches at Stratford, Forest Gate, and Walthamstow. Terms have been agreed to by the Society, and as soon as the churches have signified their acquiescence their duties will commence. Applications for the services of the Pioneer Preachers, whether for Sunday services or week-night meetings, should be made to the secretary, the Rev. T. P. Spedding. He will be pleased to give information respecting the movement to those who feel interested in this new and important missionary enterprise.

COLONIAL AND FOREIGN.

The colonial and foreign correspondence and work of the Association have grown largely during the past few years. At Johannesburg the Rev. G. C. Sharpe is engaged in the arduous task of gathering together a permanent congregation. The need for a suitable building for worship and work has become pressing. The Committee of the Association have promised a grant of £100 towards the cost of erecting a Unitarian Free Church or Hall, conditional on the congregation and its friends in Johannesburg raising not less than £500. Mr. G. W. Brown (chairman of the Colonial and Foreign Sub-committee), and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant have been authorised to collect in this country, if possible, £400 for the building fund, in addition to the grant of £100 made by the Association.

There seems to be endless opportunity for Unitarian missionary work in Western Canada. At Vancouver it is desired to erect a church, and the Committee of the Association have promised £50 to the building fund when the land is secured and building operations have commenced. At Winnipeg the Rev. Horace Westwood has entered upon his ministry in a spirit of determination and hopefulness. It is interesting to learn that the congregation at Ottawa have now as their minister the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, so well known to many Unitarians in this country. At Brisbane, in Australia, the Rev. Douglas Price is meeting with a remarkable response. Large congregations assemble week after week to listen to his message. He has now upwards of a thousand subscribers to his monthly paper, The Modernist. He also proposes starting a Postal Mission for the benefit of religious inquirers living at a distance from Brisbane. In New Zealand the new Church Hall has been opened at Timaru, and the Rev. J. H. G. Chapple is doing splendid pioneer work on behalf of the principles and faith of Unitarians. At Dunedin the Rev. F. W. Kennedy has been conducting Sunday services with considerable promise. Mr. Chapple, Mr. Jellie, and Mr. Hall, will render some guidance and assistance in the attempt to establish a Unitarian church in such an important town as Dunedin.

In Italy the Rev. G. Conte is busily engaged in varied missionary work. He has recently formed a Society or Union of Free Believers, united by their faith in a Supreme Being, by the freedom of their study of religious questions, by a common desire to translate their faith and knowledge into doing good, and promoting higher and nobler ideals of civic duty. Mr. Conte points out that he found great opposition to the idea of importing into Italy a new Protestant Church. They are attracted by the principles and faith of Unitarianism, and desire to form a new Italian organisation of their own. The committee which has been formed includes eminent professors in the Universities of Naples, of Rome, and of Pisa, men of letters, and leaders in progressive educational and social movements in Italy. These men did not know Mr. Conte personally, they were simply attracted by the principles and faith which he promulgated.

The treatment meted out to Pastor G. Traub, of Dortmund, has aroused widespread interest in Germany, and the leaders of Liberal Christianity are not a little alarmed by what they regard as a distinct set-back to the movement. The Committee of the Association have forwarded a resolution to Pastor Traub, congratulating him on the courageous stand he has made for liberty of thought and expression in religion, according to him the sympathy of the Association in the anxiety and trouble he is now enduring in consequence of his expulsion from the State Church, and expressing the hope that Liberal Christians throughout Germany will not relax their efforts in the struggle to secure complete freedom of religious worship and speech.

The visits of the Rev. W. Wooding and Mrs. Wooding to the Unitarian Churches in Australia and New Zealand were heartily appreciated by the respective congregations, and by the Committee of the Association.

tion. At a Welcome Home Meeting, held at Essex Hall, July 10, Mr. and Mrs. Wooding gave a full and interesting account of their visits, and of the excellent reception they everywhere experienced as the representatives of the Association.

OBITUARY.

The death of Mr. John Harrison has involved the Association in the loss of one of its most devoted and honoured members. Mr. Harrison had many and varied interests in life; but those who knew him best are well aware that the support and spread of the principles and faith represented by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association lay very close to his heart. He was a man beloved by those who had the privilege of working with him on the Committee; for many years he was a generous and steadfast supporter of the Association; and during the two years he held the office of President he laboured incessantly on its behalf, and for the advancement of the religious movement which it exists to promote. The Association has sustained the loss of valued supporters who were members of the Council in the death of Mr. James S. Beale of London, the Rev. Andrew Chalmers of Wakefield, and Mr. F. Monks of Southport, formerly of Warrington. To the relatives and friends of the deceased the members of the Council will desire to tender their respectful sympathy.

In moving the adoption of the Report, Mr. Hawksley paid a tribute of affection and regard to the members of Council whose death they all felt as a personal loss, including Mr. John Harrison and Mr. J. S. Beale. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, speaking on behalf of the ministers, expressed their deep sense of the loss they had sustained in the death of Mr. Harrison, who was better known amongst them than any other layman in the country. Every minister regarded him as a personal friend, and many of them had reason to be specially grateful to him for many personal acts of kindness and encouragement which they would never forget. Mr. Ion Pritchard and the Rev. F. Summers also added a few words of similar testimony. Dr. Cyril Greaves moved a resolution of sympathy with the relatives and friends of the Rev. Charles Voysey, which was seconded by Mr. Fellowes Pearson, and carried unanimously. Various other matters, chiefly arising out of the Report, were discussed by Miss E. Sharpe, the Rev. W. W. C. Pope, the Rev. W. Wooding, Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. Clennell, and the Rev. C. Roper.

AUTUMNAL MEETINGS.

The following arrangements have been made for the autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Sheffield, on Wednesday and Thursday, November 20 and 21:—

Wednesday, November 20.—Reception by the Sheffield Committee at 2.30. Conference at 3.10 on "Unitarian Thought on Vital Questions of Religion." Paper by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, followed by discussion. Conference at 4.25 on "Women's Work in our Churches," introduced by Miss E. Rosalind Lee and Mrs. Sydney Martineau. Address at 5.40 by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson on "The Call to the Churches to Sustain the Stipends of their Ministers." Tea will be provided in the Channing Hall at 6. There will be a religious service in Upper Chapel at 7.30, conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and sermon by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Thursday, November 21.—Devotional service at 10, conducted by the Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder. Conference at 10.30 on "The Religious Education of our Young People," introduced by the President and the Hon. Secretary of the Sunday School Association, and the Editor of the Sunday School Quarterly. Conference at 12 on "The Mission of the Printed Word," introduced by the Rev. Charles Roper. There will be an invitation luncheon at 1.15. Conference at 3.15 on "Our Missionary Work as Unitarians under Present-Day Conditions," introduced by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin and Mr. Percy Preston. Tea in the Channing Hall at 5.30. Public meeting in Upper Chapel at 7.30, when Mr. A. J. Hobson, the present Lord Mayor of Sheffield, will occupy the chair. Addresses will be delivered as follows:—"The Heroisms of the Past," by the Rev. Neander Anderton; "The Hopes of the Future," by the Rev. C. J. Street; "The Duties of the Present," by Mrs. Sydney Martineau; "The Call of Truth," by the Rev. Alfred Hall. Short speeches are also expected from Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone (president of the National Conference), and Mr. G. E. Verity (president of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union).

THE PRICE OF RUBBER.

THE Rev. John H. Harris, organising secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, speaking last Sunday afternoon at Whitefield's Tabernacle, said that, in cash, crude rubber from the central regions of the African and South American continents was valued at £300 per ton. But the price per ton in the loss of human life was prodigious. Every ton of rubber from the Putumayo involved a loss of ten lives. During fifteen years of the most violent Congo exploitation, King Leopold is known to have extracted about 70,000 tons of rubber, valued at twenty-one millions sterling, and the most conservative estimates go to show that the loss in human life averaged somewhere between 150 and 172 lives per ton.

THE DEANSGATE LECTURES.

THE second series of the "Deansgate Lectures" given at the Milton Hall, Deansgate, Manchester, which were so successful last winter, was started on Tuesday, October 29. The course will deal with "Modern Problems of Religious Thought." Canon Rashdall, who gave the first lecture, took for his subject "The Problem of Evil." The other lectures will be as follows:—November 5, "The Study of the New Testament," by Dr. James Moffatt; November 12, "The Permanent Value of the Old Testament," by Professor A. S. Peake; November 19, "The Unfettered Will," by Dr. Warschauer; November 26, "Christianity and other Religions," by Professor Moulton;

December 3, a lecture, the subject of which will be announced later, by Sir Henry Jones; and December 10, "The Divinity of Christ," by the Rev. William Temple. All further information may be obtained at the Milton Hall (Inquiry Office), 244, Deansgate, Manchester.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

TRAINING THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

Now that the problem of the mentally deficient has at length been forced on the attention of Parliament—even to secure consideration for the question has been a stupendous task—we ought not to forget the magnificent services of the voluntary pioneer worker, if the community as a whole takes upon itself the care of the mentally deficient. That this particular problem ought to be dealt with by the community as a whole is a matter upon which there is very little difference of opinion among disinterested workers. Miss Dendy's splendid work at Sandlebridge needs no description for readers of this journal, but perhaps some details of another remarkable institution for training the feeble-minded—that at Starcross, Exeter—may be of interest at a time when the subject is being discussed in Parliament and in the press. The fact that this particular institution was established in 1864 shows how long the voluntary worker has been pointing the way. For the details which follow we are indebted to the October number of Progress, the journal of the British Institute of Social Service.

* * *

"At the time of the last annual report there were on the books 209 boys and 94 girls, who are taught in separate classrooms, and do not associate except at meal times, entertainments or at divine service. Two hours only are devoted each morning to school-lessons; but the time spent in schools and workshops forms but a small part of their training, which goes on continuously from the time they get up in the morning until they retire to rest at night, every hour being fully occupied either at work or in the enjoyment of organised games and amusements. Boys are taught shoemaking, tailoring, brush-making, basket-making, straw-plaiting, mat-making, carpentry, wood-carving, tweed, serge, flannel and blanket weaving, house-painting, baking, farming, garden and domestic work. Girls are instructed in dress-making, needlework, knitting (both hand and machine), laundry work; the making of Honiton lace, straw hats, wool rugs and mats, in addition to all kinds of domestic work and cooking, while poultry-rearing has recently been introduced as an outdoor occupation for them. Generally speaking, each child is taught two trades, a different one on alternate weeks, which keeps the pupil's occupations from becoming monotonous. It is interesting also to note that nearly every article of clothing worn by the inmates is made on the premises, mainly by the pupils themselves."

SYNDICALISM AND THE COST OF LIVING.

It is now generally admitted that in all industrial countries, including our own, the cost of living has been going up rapidly during the last ten years, while wages have, on the whole, either remained stationary or have actually decreased. The spending power of money is a factor which is very often forgotten when the rate of wages is being discussed, and there can be no question that the spending power of money is less than it was, especially in Germany. It may not be without interest to note that some of the Continental Syndicalists have been advising their followers to consume less alcoholic liquors and tobacco, as one means of meeting the increased cost of living. With this particular piece of advice probably no one will quarrel. At the same time one must say that it is a little difficult even for professed students to keep pace with the kaleidoscopic changes of Syndicalist doctrine. M. George Sorel, the philosopher of the movement, as he was until recently, has written to his former confrères and followers expressing his great dissatisfaction with them and stating that he has joined the Royalists, whom he considers much more promising! It always has been easy to skip from the extreme left to the extreme right.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Blackpool: South Shore.—On Tuesday, October 15, a Band of Hope in connection with the Lytham-road Church was successfully established, with an encouraging attendance and a good programme, officers and committee being duly appointed. Harvest services were held on Sunday, October 20. After evening service a meeting of ladies was held, and a branch of the British League of Unitarian Women was formed.

East Ham: Liberal Christian League.—This branch has sustained a severe loss in the death of its founder, Mr. T. J. Heaven. A numerous company was present at the interment last Tuesday, including representatives from Messrs. Moir & Son, the deceased's employers, the League Executive, East Ham, West Ham, Ilford and Islington branches, and the Pioneer Preachers. The service was conducted by the Rev. Stanley James, of Walthamstow.

London: Essex Church.—The embroidered frontal, which has been carried out by Miss Violet Preston for the church, completes the scheme of decoration in the chancel. The design of flowers and foliage was prepared by Mr. Henry Holiday to harmonise with, and carry down the prevailing colours of his mosaic panels. The work has been most beautifully executed by Miss Preston, and the Church Committee has passed a resolution of thanks, on behalf of the congregation, for her kindness in undertaking it. The autumn service for members of the Boys' Own Brigade, Boy Scouts, and Boys' Clubs will take place at Essex Church on Sunday evening, November 3, at 7 o'clock. A special address will be delivered by the Rev. H. B. Speight. All who are interested in work among boys are invited to be present.

Manchester: Gorton.—The recent bazaar proved a great success, the four days' sales and donations amounting to £708. This included a generous contribution of £50 apportioned to the various stalls by Mr. Charles Hawksley. At the conclusion of the proceedings a presentation was made to the Rev. Albert Thornhill by Mr. T. Grundy, on behalf of the workers, who wished in this way to signify their warm regard for him and Mrs. Thornhill.

Mansfield.—The ministry of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan at the Old Meeting House was brought to a conclusion on Sunday evening, October 27. A crowded congregation was present. Mr. Vaughan spoke with gratitude of the freedom which had been allowed him in preaching from that pulpit. He had been allowed to say what he thought he ought to say, and this freedom had made him endeavour the more to live up to the reality of the open trust. The churches, he said, should confine themselves to religion; to make men more sensitive to the appeal of God's love. Love to man, he said, as an expression of Love to God, was the primary principle of Christianity. After the service the Lord's Supper was celebrated. Mr. Vaughan has endeared himself not only to his own congregation, but to all those with whom he has come in contact, says a correspondent. His life and preaching have emphasised the spiritual side of religion; he has endeavoured to found a common basis of agreement in the various religious denominations on things essential. "Have," he has maintained, "what opinions you will of Christ, if you will but follow the leadings of his spirit." His removal is a loss not only to the members of the congregation, but to the town of Mansfield generally. On Monday evening, October 28, a congregational service was held in the schoolroom. The chairman, Mr. W. A. Vallance, briefly reviewed the work of the last six years, during Mr. Vaughan's ministry; the extension and improvement to the church and school buildings, and the religious work that had been carried on, testifying to the high spiritual value of Mr. Vaughan's preaching and activity. Mr. J. Harrop White urged on the members of the congregation to attend regularly, and support the services and institutions during the time there was no minister. Mr. Jno. Birks made special reference to Mr. Vaughan's sermons, and to his work among the children. On behalf of the members of the congregation he was presented with a purse of gold, and a book for each of his four children as a token of respect and esteem. A large framed photo, with inscription, of the interior of the Old Meeting House, was also presented to him on behalf of the members of the "Olga Vaughan Flower Guild." Mr. Vaughan, in acknowledging the gifts, thanked the members of the congregation for their kind help and sympathy during his six years amongst them, and asked them to continue to support the services.

A United Nonconformist service was held at the Old Meeting House on Wednesday, October 23, to commemorate the Great Ejection in 1662, which was attended by most of the ministers of the town. The service was conducted by the Rev. G. E. Rudram (Primitive Methodist), the Rev. W. H. Bicknell (Baptist) and the Rev. W. H. Proudlove (United Methodist) assisting. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. J. McAdam (Congregational) and the Rev. F. H. Vaughan (minister of the Old Meeting House), the service being concluded by the Rev. A. Firth (former Baptist minister). The gathering was remarkable from the fact that it brought together, for the first time for many years in Mansfield, not only the ministers of the various denominations, but also members of the several congregations. With characteristic courage and zeal, the Rev. F. Heming Vaughan seized the opportunity to put in a plea for greater unity and co-operation among the churches in their warfare on irreligion and the social evils of the age. He pointed out how unity—not uniformity—might be obtained without sacrificing individual freedom, and spoke hopefully of the future. It was an address which struck a high note and created a powerful impression.

Marple.—A bazaar in aid of the funds of the Unitarian Church will be held on Friday and Saturday, November 8 and 9. Mr. Charles Hawksley will perform the opening ceremony on the first day, Mr. J. Hall Brooks, of Hyde, on the second day. Any help which friends are able to give will be most gratefully received. The church is still in its infancy, the first minister, the Rev. Leonard Short, having only been appointed two months ago, but it is believed that it has before it a future of usefulness and prosperity.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—A concert in aid of the funds of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, October 26, about 150 persons being present. The artists included Miss Barbour, L.R.A.M., Miss E. Coram, R.A.M., Miss Bredall, the Misses Withall, Mrs. W. Randall Marshall, Mr. H. Collier Grounds, and Mr. G. V. Carter. The secretary (Mr. E. F. Cowlin, 40, Marler-road, Forest Hill, S.E.) asks us to remind ministers and Sunday-school superintendents that Nov. 10 will be Temperance Sunday. At least 100 churches and schools observed the day last year, and in view of the increasing need for active temperance work it is hoped that the number will be larger this year. Mr. Cowlin will be glad to forward, on receipt of 3d. in stamps, a selection of the pamphlets published by the Association which may be useful to those who are preparing sermons and addresses. He adds that he would feel obliged if ministers and superintendents will send him a brief account of any services held.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Stockport on Saturday, October 26. Mr. Radcliffe Firth, of Mossley, presiding. The hon. secretary, Mr. Albert Slater, presented the annual report, this being the 25th report he has given, and in the absence of the Treasurer he also read the financial statement. Resolutions of sympathy with the relatives of the Rev. C. Wesley Butler, of Mottram, and Mr. Wm. Belfield, of Ashton, were passed. The President offered a hearty welcome into the Union to the Revs. John Ellis and Leonard Short on their settlement at Stalybridge and Marple respectively; and also gave a hearty welcome to Mr. C. Johnson, a delegate from the Midland Sunday School Association. A resolution was passed thanking Mr. F. Hepworth, of Oldham, for his services as treasurer during the past nine years, and Mr. Samuel Ashworth, of Gee Cross, was elected treasurer. The other officers were re-elected. In the evening the sixth musical festival was held in the church. The new President, the Rev. E. G. Evans, B.A., of Dukinfield, presided, and a choir of 70 voices from the schools of the Union gave an excellent programme of five anthems. Sacred solos were given by Miss Aldred, of Stockport, Miss Roebuck, of Ashton, and Messrs. F. Binyon and Jos. Robinson, of Gee Cross. Mr. Wm. Woolley acted as conductor, and Mr. James Broadbent as organist and accompanist.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The autumnal meeting of the Association was held in the Old Presbyterian Chapel, Nantwich, on Saturday, October 26. The President (Miss Edith Gittins, Newcastle), presided at the business meeting, and in the course of her address moved that a hearty welcome be given to the Rev. W. McMullan, who had lately entered the ranks of the Association through his settlement at Newcastle-under-Lyme. They had suffered a loss through the removal of the Rev. W. J. Pond from Whitechurch to Stanington, and the President proposed that a letter conveying the good wishes of that meeting be sent to him. The Rev. W. Stephens seconded the proposal, which was carried unanimously. Arrangements were made for the services at Whitechurch while the pulpit is vacant. A conference was held after the business meeting, when the hon. secretary, the Rev. W. A. Weatherall, under the title of "The work which awaits us," introduced some suggestions relating to better organisation and co-operation. An interesting discussion followed, but the general verdict of the meeting was one of warm approval. It was resolved that the President and Secretary should formulate a definite scheme on the lines of the suggestions made, and submit the proposals to the respective congregations. Afterwards a service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. W. McMullan.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly conference was held at Huddersfield on Saturday, October 26, when a paper on "Should we have a Confirmation Service for our Young People?" was read by the Rev. W. R. Shanks. The question was dealt with from the affirmative side, and an interesting discussion followed. Mr. Shanks urged the necessity for a manual to be prepared for the use of parents and teachers.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A RESIDENTIAL COLLEGE FOR WORKING WOMEN.

The council of the Robert Browning Settlement at Walworth is considering a scheme for establishing a residential college where working girls and women may have the benefit of a year's training to fit them for their work in life. Seven houses with gardens in the neighbourhood of Cheshunt have been offered to the Settlement, and the enterprise will shortly be discussed in detail at a conference of interested workers. The course of instruction laid down is of a very practical character, and there will be a Home section for the purpose of furnishing instruction in domestic matters, carpentry, drainage, laundry, dress and food values.

"OUR BETTERS."

Sir Herbert Tree spoke in a very frank way of the "mischievous doctrine implied in the phrase 'our betters,'" in his speech at Worcester on behalf of the Bishop's emergency fund for the scholars last week. To create the sense of self-respect, he declared, was the first duty of the State, but he seemed to think that this was a hard thing to do while "gentility" was our watchword. "We sing in unison the hymn of respectability. The rarest thing in humanity is independence of mind, the faculty of thinking and acting for oneself. To be oneself is the greatest luxury in the world, and I am bound to say it is the most expensive. Were we taught in our youth that happiness does not depend upon riches, nor honour upon honours, that our greatest pride should be to fulfil ourselves instead of apeing our betters, there would be less unhappiness in life."

THE JULIA WARD HOWE MEMORIAL.

The portrait of Julia Ward Howe which is to hang in the Council Chamber of the Old State House, Boston, Mass., was formally dedicated at a gathering which included several friends of anti-slavery days on October 15. Several addresses were delivered, Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead speaking the final word of tribute in reference to Mrs. Howe's influence on the women's clubs movement, and her intense interest in the cause of universal peace. A pleasing feature of the programme was the singing of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" by Miss Rosetta Key, in which the company joined. The accompaniment was played by Dr. Wendte on the little old organ, now one of the treasures of the priceless collection of antiquities in the Old State House, on which Oliver Holden composed "Coronation" at his home in Charlestown.

VEGETARIANS AND GOOD COOKING.

Lady Paget dealt severely with vegetarian cooks in a very practical paper which was read at the 65th anniversary of the Vegetarian Society, in Manchester, of which Dr. W. E. A. Axon is president. "The real fanatic vegetarians are enough to wreck the whole movement," she declared, "for their idea of cooking is nil. With the distasteful made-up things and spices which they use they produce dishes which, I think, would be a condign punishment for convicts." What is desirable, she thinks, is the practical study of the cooking of other nations from books translated carefully and exactly from the original. "A good knowledge of hygiene is the best foundation for vegetarianism," the writer added, "where it is not inspired by the highest sense of duty towards the mute creation and the knowledge that it helps to sever the threads which bind humanity to materialism."

PRINCE LICHNOWSKY AND ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

The new German Ambassador has made an important contribution to the volume on England and Germany by leaders of public opinion in both Empires, published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate. In summing up his conclusions on Anglo-German relations Prince Lichnowsky states the outstanding questions to be: Firstly: Is the opposition between us founded on development and division of power, on the whole array of political factors which evade the influence of each, and does it appear that their complete removal is only possible at the price of vital interests? To that question I would answer: Yes. Secondly: Must this opposition lead to war, and is a violent solution of the matter only in the interest of one of the two Powers? I answer emphatically, No. Thirdly, can a modus vivendi be found which shuts out war as an encroachment on essential aims and purposes, and is it possible, in spite of a certain sensitiveness, to bring about an understanding founded on respect and confidence? I believe it is.

A NEW HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

£20,000 is still required to complete the erection of the South London Hospital for Women, which will occupy a site overlooking Clapham Common, and will be staffed by women. At present the Royal Free Hospital is the only general hospital in London which admits women on its honorary staff.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE campaign in the Balkans has been one of the most meteoric in history. The military collapse of Turkey has created a situation full of the most exciting possibilities, which was not even dreamed of a few weeks ago. The refusal of the Great Powers to accede to Turkey's request for intervention makes it probable that Constantinople will fall into the hands of the Allies. And afterwards? It is impossible not to hope that the Cross will replace the Crescent in St. Sophia. The "bag and baggage" policy is the only one which is consistent with the orderly development of civilisation in South-East Europe. 1912, like 1453, may be one of the dates which mark the beginning of a new epoch.

THE result of the Presidential election in the United States will be hailed with general satisfaction. The choice of Dr. Woodrow Wilson by an overwhelming majority shows that the commonsense of the American people is proof against whirlwind campaigns and over-weening self-confidence. It is also a welcome sign of a widespread revolt against the rigging of American politics by financial interests. The attempt to discredit the new President as a Professor unfit for the turmoil of public life has failed signally. He brings to the difficulties of his high office the gifts of a trained intelligence and the practical experience which he has acquired as Governor of New Jersey during the past two years, a position in which he has showed a quiet and firm independence of boss-rule and financial intrigue.

THE Anglo-German Conference, which was held in London last week, has made an excellent impression, and its promoters are, we believe, satisfied that much good has been done in cementing the ties of friendship. The closing session was devoted to a discussion of the promotion of mutual knowledge of the two countries and their common tasks in the development of culture. Lord Courtney, who presided, spoke of the interpenetration of England and Germany in the spheres of commerce and knowledge. Science, he said, knows no national divisions. Professor Sieper, of Munich, who followed, pointed out that the press was not entirely to blame for bad feeling between the two countries. The press was only "a social secretion," and was what we made it. Other speakers were the Bishop of Winchester, Professor Foerster, of Berlin, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Professor Wendt.

As we made some strong comments upon Lord Roberts' recent speech in Manchester, we must, in fairness, call attention to the reply to his critics which appeared in the Manchester Guardian on Wednesday. Lord Roberts complains that he has been misunderstood, but we think that his letter does little to remove the painful impression created by his praise of a relentless policy of war. He thinks, apparently, that we have nothing further to gain, and can, therefore, in our own interests follow after peace; but that a patriotic German ought to desire war, as soon as a favourable opportunity arises, in order to advance the interests of the Fatherland. In the light of this explanation Lord Roberts' words lose none of their mischievous falsity. His cardinal error is that he thinks of international relationships in terms of physical force and conquered territory and not of common interests.

THE Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill made substantial progress in the House of Commons last week. The Home Office took full responsibility for the weakening amendment in regard to powers of arrest, which was introduced in the Standing Committee. Mr. McKenna said that a mistake had been made and advised the House to restore the Bill to its original form. This was agreed to without a division. On Clause 2, which provides for the flogging of male procurers on a second conviction, there was a sharp division of opinion. The Government made it a question of confidence and an anti-flogging amendment was defeated by 297 votes to 44. Subsequently an amendment to permit flogging in the case of first offenders was carried against the advice of the Home Secretary by 136 votes to 132. We comment elsewhere upon the very serious issues which are raised by this reversion to methods of violence in our penal code.

It is hardly creditable either to our intelligence or our sympathies that so little attention has been given in the public press to the strike among the women engaged in the hollow ware trade in the Black Country. The conditions of the work are unhealthy and degrading. The strike is among women, many of them blasted with disease, who have been earning 5s. to 8s. a week, for a wage of 10s. for a week of 54 hours. Here is a vignette of human misery in the wealthiest country in the world from the pen of Mr. Keighley Snowden, the special commissioner of the Daily Citizen :

"There was a little middle-aged mother with her face tied up. She pressed her fingers on her cheek bones or held her hand on the top of her head all the while she talked. She is a galvaniser. The effect of chemical fumes has been to give her incessant face-ache, but she did not speak of it until I asked why she wore the bandage. She was telling me about the strike.

" 'It's not so bad as enamelling,' she said; 'their hair comes off. It comes off nearly as soon as they start.' . . .

" 'I can stand it,' said this mother. 'My girl here couldn't; it stopped her breathing. Some can't. Their teeth go black, and they can't find an appetite. You should come and see what it's like when we are working, so thick sometimes we can hardly see one another. The masters keep out of it, I can tell you.'

" 'But is there no ventilation? Don't you have fans to keep the air clear?'

" 'Oh, they never trouble about it, bless you.'

" 'My chest was raw,' said the girl. 'It gives you a taste like sugar. That was how I couldn't eat anything.' "

* * *

"I ASKED them to describe the work," Mr. Snowden continues. "It includes taking out buckets from the acid pickle, drying them off with strong ammoniacal salts, and washing them in water. The women wear a piece of macintosh, but their bodies and legs are often wet with the last process. Not one of them knows what good health is. Not one of them escapes painful maladies.

"Those who do enamelling are sooner through with it, but they do not do enamelling from choice. They do what they must. If it is enamelling they die of plumbic anæmia, or, as they say, a decline. Whether they are reduced to skin and bone or swollen up, it comes to the same unmerciful end with them.

" 'Of course, it's not healthy work,' the suffering woman said, making no fuss of that, 'but we're willing to do it for a proper wage.' She meant 10s. a week. 'My master said that if I went out he wouldn't take me back. Well, I've come out.' "

THE question of rural housing in England must be faced. Here Ireland presents an interesting object lesson in the possibilities and results of reform. We are glad to see that a committee of the National Housing and Town-Planning Council has been studying the working of the Irish Labourers' Acts on the spot. They report that the cheap cottage, built by public authority, and let at less than an economic rent, has had a marked influence in improving the health and physique of the people. Wages have also increased, and when allowance has been made for the serious shortage of labour due to emigration, the higher standards of life created by better housing must also be reckoned as an important factor.

BARBAROUS FORMS OF PUNISHMENT.

THERE can be no doubt, we hope, in the mind of any of our readers, especially after various comments and remarks on the subject which have appeared in our editorial columns, of our strong desire that the White Slave Traffic Bill should be passed into law in an effective form in the present session of Parliament. It is hardly necessary for us to say that we have no sympathy with any plea for delay or for the kind of factious criticism and opposition, coupled with the dead weight of moral indifferentism, to which a Bill of this kind is always exposed. But a determined attitude and a high degree of moral indignation do not mean that we are to suspend our powers of judgment and simply clamour for the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill. From the day of its first introduction many of the best friends of reform have regarded some of its provisions with misgiving, and in one respect misgiving has been deepened into alarm by the clamour for a brutal form of punishment and the zest with which the House of Commons yielded to it last week.

A careful perusal of the debate yields little in the way of well-considered argument in favour of a reversion towards methods of barbarism in our treatment of even the worst type of criminals. The Home Secretary spoke like a man who was violating his own convictions, and threw the responsibility upon the police. Other members indulged in heartless gibes at men "who were animals and must be treated as animals," or regarded the objections to flogging as mere sentimentalism. One member went so far as to say that he was glad to know that foreigners who were the people most engaged in this traffic could be deported from this country, but when they left he should like them to carry away the hall-mark of British muscle on their backs, and this savage statement was greeted with cheers. We hope that the House of Commons will be in a more sober mood when the Bill comes before it on the Report stage, and will remember that a passion for violence is a very poor substitute for the righteousness that exalteth a nation. Most men have only to look into their own hearts in order to discover how easily moral indignation degenerates into angry vindictiveness.

The letter by Mr. H. S. SALT, which appeared in the Nation last Saturday, and another by Mr. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, published in the Daily News and Leader on Monday, state the case against flogging very forcibly. Mr. SALT points out that its introduction into the White Slave Traffic Bill is only one aspect of what he calls the craze of the "crimes of violence flagellants." "It is certain," he says, "that if the flogging of the White Slave Traffickers is legalised, the demand will quickly be extended for the similar punishment of other classes of offenders." Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM puts the whole matter with such admirable force that we must quote the following passage in extenso :—

"Once again the sentimentalists have prevailed, and on the Statute Book of England (I hope Scotland will not be disgraced by its application) they have inscribed a law, foolish in itself, degrading in its effects, and tantalising to the freeman who is compelled to become the instrument of the degradation of a fellow being. One of those spasms of pseudo-virtue that have so often made our country a byword abroad, and have caused us to be held up to scorn as hypocrites, has infected the House of Commons. By an immense majority the House has re-established torture in our penal code.

"True that it may have lingered in old and unrepealed statutes, but it has been reserved for an advanced Liberal Government to revert to the legislation of the middle ages and to the methods of the Inquisition. Modern and humane legislation in every country in the world has declared against the use of torture; England has boldly taken the first backward step.

"That the offence for which it was adjudged was an odious offence in no wise condones the folly and the unwisdom of the step. When a hundred years ago whippings, scourgings and hangings were of weekly occurrence crime was far more rampant than it is to-day. No severity, no torture, no degrading punishments have ever put down crimes; they have but degraded the inflictors of them."

We desire only to add one or two comments for the serious consideration of our readers.

(1) Have the enlightened men and women who are in favour of flogging in this particular case considered the matter patiently and carefully in its relation to the whole course of penal reform during the last twenty-five years? When they say that this is the one and only crime for which flogging may be invoked they are on very slippery ground. There is no logical line to be drawn between this class of offence and many others, and any weakening of the moral sense of the community in its dislike of barbarous methods of punishment is fraught with very grave danger.

(2) There is, we think, the further danger that a great many people, when they have satisfied the pangs of conscience by doing something drastic, will think that their responsibility is at an end. These low-class criminals, whom it is proposed to flog, are in many cases the last term in a long nexus of moral causes in which, alas! few of us can disclaim responsibility. The recent literature on the White Slave traffic has thrown a searchlight upon the defenceless position of thousands of women in our industrial civilisation. We place them in the most exposed position in the fighting line, and when they fall victims to the enemy the men who sweat their labour, and all of us who acquiesce tamely in their economic helplessness are in a very real sense joint-authors of their downfall. If flogging is the fit punishment for the procurer, how is society to deal with the economic man who coolly calculates his profits from the underpaid work—the blood and virtue—of women? Flogging those who decoy them at the last stage of their helplessness will give them no permanent security.

(3) There is one provision which will commend itself without a moment's hesitation to people of all shades of opinion. The flogging enactment is not to apply to women. It cannot be pleaded that the women engaged in this traffic are not numerous, and at least as degraded as the men. But the whole of society would rise up in revolt if there were any suggestion that they should be flogged. In some moods we may deprecate this feeling as mere sentiment, but in reality it rests upon a deep and instinctive reverence for human nature, which is inseparable from our Christian civilisation. We see in every woman the potential wife or mother. In religious language, we honour the image of God more easily in a woman than in a man, and so in their case we refrain from forms of brutality in punishment which are inconsistent with the faith which says, "Ye are the temple of the Holy Spirit." Probably also the tender pictures which have been left to us of CHRIST's dealings with sinful women have helped to decide our attitude. But in all these ways Christianity makes no distinction between men and women. The inexhaustible treasures of its redeeming love are for all. It never dares to say that the male criminal is so degraded that torture and brutality cannot degrade him any further. What we miss in this wave of passionate indignation, with its too eager relapse into barbarous forms of punishment, is the true note of the Gospel. Underlying it all there is a terrible hopelessness about human nature, a confession that in face of degrading crime our moral forces are bankrupt. Flogging has only been defended because it appeals to a craven instinct of fear. Is this the last word of Christian civilisation in face of the most terrible and insistent problem of human redemption?

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE INNER SIGNIFICANCE OF GUILDS OF HELP.

THE term "Guild of Help" suggests high things. There are so many organisations of this kind now in England, and so much has been written and spoken about them, that it is not proposed in this article to give more than the merest outline of their construction and method of work, but to dwell rather on their inner significance. All are worked on very similar lines varying only slightly in detail. The one with which the present writer has been so closely associated is worked as follows:—The district is divided into ten wards—each ward has a committee consisting of chairman, secretary, and a band of voluntary "helpers." Each helper is responsible for a certain number of houses, and is expected to visit these weekly or fortnightly. The object of their visits is to help to break down barriers between the classes, and to create real friendships between men and women of different social standing, and to befriend the poorest without patronising them. In this particular guild, as in many others, relief is given to the most needy cases, and each ward committee meets every fortnight to discuss the special instances which are reported by the various helpers. Once a month a central board meeting is held at the Town Hall, and this board consists of the chairman of the Guild of Help (who is also for the time being the chairman of the district), the vice-chairman, the district treasurer and secretary, who both kindly give their services free to the Guild, and the various chairmen and secretaries of the different wards. Reports are brought, accounts submitted, extravagances checked if necessary, and general criticism given. This, briefly, is the mechanism of Guilds of Help.

After six years' experience as a ward secretary, one asks oneself what one has learnt during that time as to the value of the work, and what are the qualifications necessary for both secretaries and helpers. The vital thing, surely, is the spirit and attitude of mind in which each member of a Guild of Help should approach such work. In using the word work, one is anxious at once to dissociate it from a common interpretation, i.e., the restless rushing about and doing things with a constant sense that something must be "done"—so many visits must be paid, so much information hastily extracted, so many relief tickets left behind, and so on. When that is accomplished there is a tendency to settle down with a sense of self-satisfaction. The day's work has been "done" and there is no need to bother any more. Mr. E. F. Benson says, in one of his books: "I never feel sure that working is not a sort of drug that makes us dream we are living." In the sense interpreted above, one may venture to say that it is a danger all Guild workers should bear in mind. To bring an atmosphere of rush and officiousness into the houses we visit is to destroy the life of the soul, both of visitor and visited. The aim of Guild workers is to establish friendly relations between them, and friendships can only be formed through sympathy, and to sympathise one must understand, and to understand one must listen—and listen until one does understand. Great patience is often required, and equally a quick imagination and a respect for the feelings of those who honour us with their confidence. A ruthless questioning when anxious for information is worse than useless, though at times, when the question of relief is concerned, it may be unavoidable. Brightness is indispensable, and a sense of humour a great asset.

It is no small joy to realise how one may change the current of people's lives through these visits, as the following illustration will testify.

Mrs. A—, a lonely, delicate widow, living as best she can on the few shillings she earns weekly through her sewing, called one day on her Ward Secretary and said: "I've come to thank you for having sent me Miss F—. She has quite changed my life. I was that down when you found me out that I didn't want to go on living any longer. Miss F— came to me as an angel. She lets me tell her all my troubles, and just the telling of them makes me feel a lot better. If I break down, she helps me to pull myself together again. She's always cheery, and always thoughtful, and I don't feel any more as if I were all alone in the world. I've come to ask you, please, never to take her away. She's away on a holiday now, and doesn't know I have to give up my room, so I've come to ask you whether Rosemary-street is in your ward, for I won't go anywhere that's out of it. I'm that anxious not to lose Miss F—."

The best visits have been paid where all self-consciousness vanishes—when there is no conscious thought of doing good, only the strong bond of human sympathy that longs to be in touch with some suffering, or lonely soul, to relieve the monotony of dull lives, to strengthen the weak, and to bring brightness and light wherever it is wanted. But, besides the qualities of heart, both mind and energy are required. Many are ignorant, and inert, and must be helped on to their feet, and every effort made to find them suitable work. The helper has constantly to face some of life's biggest problems—how, for instance, to deal with cases of immorality and drunkenness, and with the inefficient and unemployed. This work, indeed, means travail of the soul. It is impossible not to suffer, and very hard at times not to be greatly depressed. We need sustained moral enthusiasm, and for this we must turn to religion, which, as Professor Jacks has said, not only rouses but maintains such enthusiasm. We need, too, a sense of values and proportions to keep us steady, a great hope, and a conviction of the worth-whileness of our efforts. We stretch out hands to the Church of Christ, the great Universal Church, to help us, and all whom we are working and living for. It is this Church that teaches us we are all children of one Father, all sheep of the one Shepherd, who cannot rest if a single one of his flock be missing, that proclaims the supremacy of the spiritual over the material, that scorns distinctions between rich and poor, that stretches out pitying hands to the distressed, that teaches the solidarity of the human race, and shows how we fall and rise, suffer and rejoice together. It is the Church that sets forth that wonderful mystery of love and suffering as exemplified on the Cross, and impresses upon us that the height of self-realisation is attained through self-sacrifice. The Church is in our midst to reveal the deep spiritual significance of vicarious suffering—the heritage of every true Christian—and to call upon each one of us, as long as there is sin or sorrow in the world, to take his or her share in removing what one and all are individually more or less responsible for. It is the Church also that helps us to realise that the sorrow which binds us to humanity, and impels us to dedicate our lives in willing, unselfish service to others—it is this that makes us one with Christ, and that the iron chains of suffering against which we so often chafe are thus converted by His Spirit into golden links of love and blessedness.

M. EMILE BOUTROUX.

THE election of M. Emile Boutroux to the French Academy is a matter for international interest and congratulation. His early book on Pascal has long been known to students of French literature as one of the most masterly volumes in the series to which it belongs; but in recent years the translation of several of his books into English has won for him a wide reputation among all serious students of religious thought. The following description of his intellectual gifts and personal charm appeared in the Times on the day after his election:—

"M. Emile Boutroux, apart from his eminence as an historian of philosophy and a leader of French speculative thought, is one of the strongest links which unites the culture of France with that of other countries, and, particularly, with the literary, philosophical, and religious life of Great Britain and America. He is honorary Professor of Modern Philosophy at the Sorbonne, a member of the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, Director of the "Fondation Thiers," a kind of residential college for post-graduate study, and President of the Association of Former Pupils of the Ecole Normale Supérieure. There is no more illustrious representative of 'sweetness and light' in the world of modern philosophical and religious discussion. In personal intercourse, as in his literary activities, he is the essence of conciliation, quiet kindness, intellectual modesty and respect for the opinions of others. His character and influence in many respects resemble those of the late Master of Balliol, Edward Caird."

IN MEMORIAM.

SHELLEY said, "I will paint you a picture." And he dipped his brush in dew and sunshine and fairy essences and painted "The Skylark." And they said, "He shall be called one of the Great."

And Dante said, "I will build you a temple." And he took shining pieces of marble and laid them one upon the other and built a temple of many stories. And they said, "What matter though the builder die in exile?" but afterwards, "He shall be called one of the Greatest."

And Father Tyrrell said, "Come with me into this building, and I will show you the most wonderful and the grandest cathedral the world has ever known. Its foundations go down to the centre of the earth, and it is so spacious—there is always room. It has taken hundreds, hundreds upon hundreds, of years to build, and it is not completed yet. But there are some side chapels which have been built on by careless or ignorant workers; the material of these is deficient, it is already crumbling, let us clear them away. Some of the windows have been boarded up; let us pull down the boarding that the light may shine through." On the Holy Altar spurious and unlovely creations have place among the golden vessels—let us destroy them. The shrines of antiquity are bolted and barred against all comers; let us take off the bolts and bars, that he who comes with reverent feet may have free access. Let us do all this for love of the building, and restore to its old beauty this incomparably grand Cathedral."

And they said, "Thou art Anathema," and they chased him out—and he died.

And his friends who loved him mourn—and wait.

FATHER TYRRELL'S DREAM.

SIR,—Canon Lilley's admirable article on Father Tyrrell prompts me to make one or two further remarks which may prove of interest to the readers of the "Autobiography and Life."

When I first wrote my little book "A Free Catholic Church," I had not read a line of Father Tyrrell's writings. But as the proofs were being corrected, I came across his "Much-abused Letter" and Mr. W. J. Williams's book, "Newman, Pascal, Loisy and the Catholic Church." I was thus able to incorporate references to these books in the proofs, and to give in the Introduction to my own slender volume topical references to these living movements. After its publication, and before I had ever met or written to Father Tyrrell, he sent me a letter, most of which is now published in the Life. It is in this letter that he explains most fully what he used to call his "door-step policy."

16, Old Town, Clapham,
London, S.W.
March 6, 1907.

MY DEAR SIR,—Something in your "Free Catholic Church" reminded me so much of the pseudonymous "Agnostic's Progress" that I fancied myself rather clever in detecting the same writer under the pseudonym Lloyd Thomas. My critical vanity received a rude awakening from its illusions last night, and I hasten first to apologise for doubting your existence; and secondly to thank you most cordially for a very stimulating book with which I find myself considerably though not entirely in agreement, and which I have already got several people to read (and buy). I ought also to thank you for your generous remark about the over-much-abused, but now too kindly used and even overrated Letter.

Where I hesitate to join you is in the hope or feasibility of any sort [of] new communion constituted by those who may feel in conscience bound to stand away from their present position. I quite agree that there are limits to the duty of conformity and the fear of schism; that sometimes it is necessary to speak out and take the consequences, as Mr. Campbell has done. But I think a man may do so just because he believes in his religion, not because he disbelieves in it, as, e.g., the first Christians really thought they were the true Israel, and the first reformers thought themselves the true Catholics. They were not schismatics in intention, but only because the parent body would not open the door to them. The deliberate schisms have seldom (I think) been spiritually fruitful. What may partly realise your programme will be, perhaps a growing multitude of excommunicés from the various denominations, sitting, as it were, on the doorsteps all down the street waiting vainly for readmission to their several homes; bound by a strong spiritual bond tighter than that of any external institution and re-acting powerfully for good, by their collective significance, on the more comfortable indoor folk. Yet I uphold (with Newsom) the duty of each man to stay within and work for his own household as long as he conscientiously can; certain that in so doing he is working for a free, but still external and institutional Catholicism of the Future, which is at least an ideal to be approached, if not to be attained. For my own part, I should be most sorry to squeeze all the members of the L.S.S.R. [London Society for the Study of Religion] into the mould of Roman Catholicism as it is now. I should rather labour to stretch and expand Romanism till it is wide enough to receive you all without damage to your individuality and spiritual liberty. If we all work that way for our respective communions (instead of leaving them), we shall best serve the interests of the true Catholicism. A new Catholicism would be a new sect. The fault of the old is that it is a sect at all. I do not want to condemn "converts" from one "ism" to another "ism." I am one myself, albeit of near 30 years' standing. But I am sure the justifying conditions obtain very rarely, and that the result is often a grave spiritual injury, both to the man himself, to the community he leaves, and to the community he joins. Hence I will do nothing unnecessarily to procure my own excommunication, though I will never so much as equivocate to prevent it; and when it happens I will not join any existing body nor help to form a new one, but will stand on the doorstep and knock and ring and make myself a nuisance in every possible way.

Thanking you once more for your encouragement and stimulation.

I am, yours faithfully,

G. TYRRELL.

Shortly afterwards I happened to come across him at a meeting of the London Society for the Study of Religion. He came to me and said, "Well, we agree, don't we?" I answered, "Yes, entirely, on the Ideal of a Free Catholic Church, but I fear we differ fundamentally on the ethics of compromise and conformity. I cannot feel it right to stay in the creed-bound Churches." "Ah," he replied, with a laugh which I believe only covered his inward sadness, "you want to drag me out of the Roman Church, and it wants to kick me out." I forget how we changed the topic, but I remember uttering some platitude about the intensely interesting and critical nature of the religious issues of our day. He looked down pensively, and then said quietly, but with a seriousness that startled me. "Yes, if I had my choice of a period to live in, I should choose no other." That remark, and the deliberate way in which he said it, made a lasting impression on me, and I have thought of it often this last week as I read his "Autobiography and Life."

Canon Lilley tells us that Father Tyrrell never came to feel permanently the oppression which the sense of failure brings. One is glad to be assured of that. At the same time it seems to me that, loyal as he was to the Roman Church, he came towards the end to see that the policy of "reforming from within" was futile. "Patchings and mendings have an end," he wrote, "and revolutions are normal in all true development. But revolutions are heralded by periods of chaos." He recognised, as Mr. Lilley says, that the Roman system must perish. In one of his letters he writes: "I believe that religion must and will re-embody itself. But none of these old bottles will do. Nor can we make a new one. It will grow. But we shall have forty years in the desert between Egypt and Jerusalem." And, again: "The old bottles cannot contain the new wine. Burst they must. Yet my sole interest was not in the new wine, but in the old bottles." And six months before he died he wrote: "A long talk with Hensley Henson yesterday about the Church of England. I am afraid things are very hopeless there. Houtin and Loisy are right, the Christianity of the future will consist of mysticism and charity and possibly the Eucharist in its primitive form as the outward bond. I desire no better." And Miss Petre speaks of his "growing conviction, viz. that reform would never succeed, that revolution would be needed."

What I should like to put to all your readers is the question, Is this dream of Tyrrell's all a vain mirage? Are we going to let it remain a dream? Is there no hope in it? For me, I confess, no hope at all as far as the creed-bound and orthodox trust bound churches are concerned. We must give them up to inevitable decrepitude and exhaustion. Let the dead bury their dead, but go thou and preach the Kingdom of God.

But the free men and women—are they going to eat out their hearts in the desolation of great abstract and agnostic phrases, or will they find faith enough to give colour and romance and passion to the "holy remnant" of the Church of Christ? I think, if we abandoned our crude negations and arid rationalisms, our fear of imagination and art and feeling, and trusted more in our best instincts and intuitions, we might succeed in beginning to realise the dream to which Father Tyrrell so heroically gave his life.—Yours, &c.,

CONCERNING ESSEX HALL.

SIR,—Mr. Ronald P. Jones has surely done good service in calling attention to the glaring defects of our premises at Essex Hall, and no one who views them (as he does) in contrast with the fine and commodious rooms and offices at the new Wesleyan Buildings, Westminster, will complain of his emphasis. Year by year, not only the inadequacy and pettiness, but the positive dangers of our central hall impress many of us with increasing force; although there are some who, like myself, remember the joy with which, in 1885, we quitted the obscure little room at 37, Norfolk-street, and entered into occupancy at Essex-street. It was, indeed, a great stride forward, and one made possible, as we gratefully recall, by the splendid enthusiasm and generosity of good friends, amongst whose names that of the Rev. Dr. Drummond shines specially bright.

Well, that was a generation ago, and now it is a new delight to see the new generation reaching out, unsatisfied, for something better. Mr. Ronald Jones, I fell certain, voices the feelings of many, who, free from the memories some of us are old enough to share, see things as they are and without sentimental prepossessions. Thanks are due to him and all who urge us forward. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that this subject has been for some time dear to several of our best friends—I can name none better than the late Mr. John Harrison. If it is not yet an open secret, the time has come, I think, when it may be stated that during Mr. Harrison's first year as President of the B. and F.U.A. we paid special attention to this question. At that time there was a possibility of disposing of the Essex Hall site to a firm then housed close by, and Mr. Harrison was eager to seize the opportunity, should it become actual, of transferring our headquarters to more satisfactory buildings. When this particular possibility passed away, the idea was still alive in his mind; he gave privately considerable pains and expense toward obtaining surveys and plans, and accepted a second year's presidentship chiefly in the hope that a scheme might be carried through. He was prepared, though not a man of great wealth, to give a very large donation to start it; but unhappily it fell through, and its failure was among the griefs of his closing years.

Sir, next year is the Centenary of the Trinity Act, by which Unitarians were at last freed from the disabilities imposed upon them by the Act of Toleration, 1689. I wonder if the fine appeal of Mr. Ronald Jones will lead to the crowning of our Centenary thanksgiving by securing a really worthy centre for our ever-growing work. It would be a big thing—but the occasion, and our chances of really effective life and fruitfulness, call for a big thing. We have some amongst us, I believe, who could do it, and many who would. Is it too much to hope that somewhere there is the munificent founder who both can and will?—Yours, &c.,

SWEATING IN THE CITY.

SIR,—In reference to Mr. Capleton's informing article on this matter in your issue of the 26th inst., it ought, I think, to be pointed out that low pay for clerical work is not confined to London. Not long ago the two following advertisements appeared in a local evening paper:—"Wanted, office boy. Wages, 2s. 6d. a week." "Smart cash-girl required for draper's shop. Salary, 5s. 6d. a week."

Even allowing for the fact that, in provincial towns, workers can sometimes live within walking distance of their work, and that the wages mentioned may have been "commencing" ones, they are, especially the latter, scandalously low.

It is difficult to suggest a remedy, apart from the cultivation of a Christian conscience, without venturing on what is, in your columns, the forbidden ground of politics, but one occurs to me which does not involve legislative action, and, therefore, may not be taboo. I mean Trade Unionism.

Were clerical workers even as well organised as, notwithstanding the enormous leeway they have to make up, the handworkers are, we should soon see an increase in their rate of pay.—Yours, &c.,

FRED. G. JACKSON.

[We venture to correct a false impression which may be left by one sentence in our correspondent's letter. While THE INQUIRER is non-political in the narrow and technical sense of party loyalty, it deals continually with the moral and social interests of human beings as members of a polity. It has no desire to be non-political in the sense which suggests the safety of non-committal and the torpor of perpetual dulness.—ED. of INQ.]

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE OF SERVICE.

SIR,—In your issue of Saturday last there appears a letter signed by the two secretaries of the above League appealing for funds and helpers. In the course of the appeal the writers beg to call attention to the fact "that in these days of widespread interest in child nurture there is no organised attempt . . . to meet the needs of the child at a time when it can only be reached through the mother." As a member of the Executive Committee of the Manchester Schools for Mothers, and a regular worker at the same, may I trespass on your space in order to correct this statement. We have had schools for mothers in Manchester and Salford for four years now—and in this present year have four in Manchester and one in Salford, in full work. Through the Manchester ones alone during 1911 over 6,000 dinners (at a small charge) were served to expectant and nursing mothers, while of professional help we employ a doctor, two superintendants, and four trained visitors, and have over 70 voluntary helpers. Our aims are precisely those mentioned by the secretaries of the "Women's League of Service," i.e., better health of the mother, and her education in all matters appertaining to the care and nurture of young children.

I do not wish in any way to deter people from coming to the assistance of the Women's League of Service, only in justice to the Society I serve I venture to make this correction, also feeling that in these days of more organised social work and civic welfare it is a pity that two societies whose aims seem so identical should be unaware of each other's existence. I believe there are several schools for mothers at work in London now. The pioneer one, at St. Pancras, paved the way for the Manchester ones. Our hon. secretary is Miss E. V. Eckhard, Broome House, Didsbury, Manchester, who would, I am sure, gladly give any more information.—Yours, &c.,

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

SIR,—May we call the attention of your readers to the important Temperance Convention which will be held at 2.30 on Wednesday, November 13, in the new Wesleyan Hall, Westminster, prior to the deputation which the Prime Minister has promised to receive later in the afternoon.

It is very desirable that the strong temperance sentiment throughout the country should voice itself on such an important occasion, and we have therefore endeavoured to secure by circulars to the churches, Temperance Societies, Brotherhoods, and other bodies, the presence of a large and influential gathering. It is, however, possible, owing to the shortness of the notice, that some churches and societies may have been overlooked, and we shall, therefore, be greatly obliged if in such case friends will communicate with us at 11, Tothill-street, Westminster, S.W., when we will forward them tickets for the gathering.

May we appeal to all who have the best interests of our country at heart to take this opportunity of showing to the Prime Minister and to the Government the importance which the churches of our country attach to the introduction of a Licensing Bill in the session of 1913.

"The ever present tragedy" demands an "immediate remedy."—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE SCHOLAR AS PROPHET.

Main Currents of Modern Thought. By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by Meyrick Booth, Ph.D. T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

IF we are sometimes disposed to withhold our assent to the bolder constructions of the philosophical mind because they seem so far from the working experience of our kind, we cannot help being won at least to a sympathetic attention when an attempt is made to exhibit them as the rightful outcome of the long history of thought. Keats said that we could not be sure of any truth until we had tried it on our pulses. In the splendid piece of work before us Eucken ventures upon this task, and shows us his grand conception of the Spiritual Life as a clear resultant of all Man's travail of soul through the ages. We are enabled to hold a review of the entire circle of problems and studies that enter into the philosophy of religion, in such a way that these are no longer so many intellectual inquiries merely, but are filled with urgent interest by their relation to the pressing needs of modern life. There is a kind of philosophising which has its own legitimate methods and value, but the interest of which is purely scientific; it is concerned with the development and defence of a number of concepts which are regarded as an end in themselves. Not of this kind is Eucken's work. While no one could characterise him as bending his views to the shape and service of practical requirements, and substituting pragmatic tests for a rigorous ideal of truth, it can yet be said that his philosophy does in a most noble way seek to "serve the present hour." His pages throb and glow with an intense passion which is the preacher's spirit at its highest. Here is a man with a faith and a message, convinced and able to convince, laying open the wound he would heal with a sureness and directness that is perhaps found in no other modern thinker, and eager that all the world shall have the opportunity of seeing as he sees. But the preaching philosopher is regarded with rather more suspicion even than the philosophical preacher, and hence it is Eucken's great good fortune that he is known to Europe as a remarkable scholar in philosophical history, a competent student of Aristotle, and a thoroughly well equipped and original critic of the great systems and writers. It is, in fact, only in more recent years that he has turned to writing his great constructive books, and if there are readers who find themselves unable to understand his teaching when presented in the abstract form, it might be well for them to spend some time upon the historical works which bring out into clear shape Eucken's own views in contrast to other systems. It is a special recommendation of the present work that it does this. Its method is to take the leading controversies of our time one by one (e.g., Idealism and Realism, Intellectualism and Pragmatism, the Mechanical and Organic views of the Universe, Monism and Dualism, Immanence and Transcendence), giving first, in each case, a concise account of the history of the controversy up to the present day, and then showing how it presents itself to the modern mind; and after exhibiting the validity or weakness of the views held about it, concluding with a clear indication of the direction in which a solution is to be found. By means of this arrangement we can take any special point that interests us, and study it both for its own sake and also in connection with other problems. There is, e.g., the conception of law, which means so much for modern science: we are shown its roots in Plato and Aristotle, and then the idea is traced down to the recent controversies in Germany on "historic method." All this sounds very technical in a summary statement, but the impression received from the pages of the book itself, even in a translation (the translation indeed reads beautifully, and gives the feeling of an original work), is anything but technical; and the secret of this is the broad human interest and earnest faith which inspires the whole. If anyone has found it difficult to know "what Eucken is driving at"—and, of course, every new master has a strange look at first—let him turn up the section in this book on Monism and Dualism. Here we are in mid-stream, among all the rush and swirl of modern tendencies which are so confusing in actual experience, but are here discriminated by one who battles among them with complete security: naturalism, materialism, spiritualism, monism, all deliver up their meaning and significance under Eucken's method. He is not carried away from his course by any of them, but they all help to bear him on. It might seem that one who is thoroughly idealist in his general attitude, and has left behind the Dualism which was long thought of as the only safe mooring amidst a world of troubles, must have no choice but to commit himself to one of the various monistic tendencies of our time—Hegelian, materialistic, or "double-aspect theory." But no! He has a conception that guides better than any of these. The trouble about any and every one of these monistic creeds is that they more or less expressly reduce man's spiritual, self-active, true nature to a form of the world's natural life, and a subordinate form at that. Eucken will not have this, but strikes out boldly for the self-subsistent reality of the life which, for us men, alone is life. This, and not any of the natural categories (cause, time, space, form, substance) is to be the dominant and leading clue to our quest. It is not a whim of the philosopher that makes him choose this out from among other possibilities. It is our own actual moral and spiritual experience that does this for us. It may—it does—leave many things in nature still unexplained; but that is better than the imposition upon our spiritual experience of natural categories which leave everything in that experience unexplained. For our first need is to live and to act; our thinking therefore must follow the guidance of our acting. Eucken's philosophy is therefore Activism. It is idealist in that it finds a spiritual reality to be the deepest foundation of all reality. But idealism too often explains nature away and then passively accepts the result as the best of all possible worlds. But Eucken calls upon us not to etherealise the world but conquer it. It is not sufficient that Spirit is. It must assert itself: it must act.

DR. FORSYTH ON MARRIAGE.

Marriage: its Ethic and Religion. By P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d. net.

THERE is doubtless room in this questioning world for such a book as Dr. Forsyth's in support of the traditional view of marriage. We have been so pervasively exploited by the "Puckish persons" who are making ducks and drakes of institutions as they are, that it is well a sober voice should try now and then to show cause why the generations may not, after all, be entirely in the wrong. But having acknowledged this, we doubt if Dr. Forsyth's book will reach the people he desires to convince. The rebels against convention are not wont to listen patiently, in fact they will probably not listen at all, to voices from such remote purlieus of thought and speaking such a language as this. He is not addressing the palpably vicious, but the "social heretics," the "critical Idealists," the "social programme-makers" and system-mongers "who would dissolve the traditional view of the sanctity of marriage under the belief that its fixity is a premium on hypocrisy." With these heretics Dr. Forsyth deals faithfully as one speaking from the seats of the mighty—or more accurately, in a manner always suggestive of what the arch-heretic calls "the respectability of the rented pew." It takes, however, "an angel to tell a man he's wrong in the right way," and the author is, happily, still included among things terrestrial. But his plain common-sense is salutary enough in a generation tending to lose its head in this direction, and to be unduly intoxicated by clever phrases. For that large majority of literal and amiable persons to whom modern revolts and clever phrases are a fond thing vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, this book will be extremely fortifying.

Dr. Forsyth speaks, of course, from the religious, i.e., the Christian point of view. For him the verdict of the Church, i.e., "the company of the soul's experts, the experients of the Gospel and the Spirit," coincides, in the matter of marriage, with the line and tendency of evolution, of civilisation. Christian marriage is monogamous, and monogamy is the index of civilisation; it is indissoluble; it is ethical in object. The development of the moral personality, not merely a biological intention, is the end of Christian marriage. With regard to the subordination of the woman which seems to be involved in the Christian idea of marriage, Dr. Forsyth takes an analogy from the Holy Trinity, and the relation of the Son to the Father: "in his very obedience the Son was co-equal with the Father, for his yielding was no less divine than the Father's exigent will." Therefore, in the very nature of God, subordination implies no inferiority. There is a fine idea here; but to many, such reasoning may sound unreal and in the air.

The most useful part of the book is that dealing with "leasehold marriage." The author marshals the stern consequences that would follow, and follow particularly to the woman, if marriages became terminable at will. It is difficult to see how his arguments here can be met, granting that the stability of the family is desirable and necessary. For the rest, we find Dr. Forsyth unsatisfying. He touches neither the depths nor the heights; and the reader has a right to look for these in a book with this title, and treating of this great and crucial theme. It is true that he deliberately selects the pragmatic method, setting out to show what practical difference it will make if his convictions rather than the views he combats are in the right. But there is a nether world of marital disgust and perplexity, and even struggle against self, in which the best in this kind of books are but shadows, unless imagination mend them. As for the heights, we inevitably compare this book with "The Drama of Love and Death," widely divergent as are the writers' points of view. Though Edward Carpenter holds no brief for Christianity, nor even for religion in any explicit sense, the reader looks up from the perusal of his pages thrilled and penetrated by the idealistic possibilities, the mysteriously exalted implications of the true and perfect marriage. Dr. Forsyth says that marriage may be sacramental; Mr. Carpenter makes us realise vividly that the real union is. Dr. Forsyth, guiltless of sentimentality, gives us much excellent advice in plain pedestrian prose. We finish his book with an irresistible mental picture of a decorous middle-class wedding, including this volume among the wedding-presents. Mr. Carpenter suggests ultimate meanings in Love and Life and Death, which make us cease to wonder that when the great mystics would express the longing of the soul for union with God—that "tremendous Lover" following it "down the nights and down the days"—they are driven to use the symbolism of marriage. We are no longer in the region of utilities and settled respectabilities; we have had a glimpse of "the portals of that other land where the great Voices sound, and visions dwell." F. R.

THE ENGLISH STAGE. By D. E. Oliver. London: John Ouseley, Ltd. 1s. 6d. net.

WE owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. D. E. Oliver for his pleasantly written and instructive study of the origin of the English stage and the developments of modern dramatic art. Such a book is a distinct boon not only to the intelligent playgoer, who visits the theatre for something more than mere amusement, but to the earnest student of social tendencies who is anxious to discern what the public needs as well as what it wants in the way of public entertainment. We believe, with Mr. Oliver, that the auguries for the future are extremely favourable, and that there is an "increasing desire for serious, natural, and thoughtful plays, the purpose of which, according to Ibsen, should be to represent human beings and human destinies on a groundwork of modern social conditions and principles." To this desire the repertory theatres in particular are ministering with increasing success. We share his enthusiasm, too, for the scheme which has been so admirably set forth by the promoters of the National Memorial Theatre in London. The mere outline of their programme should make the British citizen ashamed of himself. We are far behind Germany even in the study and performance of the works of Shakespeare, but superhuman efforts are required, it would seem, to impress the public with the fact that a national theatre erected in his memory would only place the greatest city in the world on a level (at last) with almost every important capital in Europe.

A CHINESE ST. FRANCIS, OR THE LIFE OF BROTHER MAO. By C. Campbell Brown. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d. net.

CHENG MAO was the son of a shoemaker, who became converted to Christianity by foreign missionaries at the "Worship Hall" in his native city, and had to suffer grievous hardships as a result of his filial disobedience and heresy. From his earliest days he had been inured to poverty and privation, but he seems to have been endowed with such a singularly lovable and transparent nature that we can quite understand how difficult it was during the period of his initiation into the "strange doctrines" which had attracted him "to bring home a sense of guilt to one who had, so far as he knew, been always true to his convictions." The effort, we should have thought, was hardly necessary, but the fact that it was earnestly made indicates the particular attitude towards Christianity adopted by Mao's teachers, and apparently by the writer of the book. Their method of presenting the Gospel story seems rather lacking in breadth and insight, and the references to "heathen" beliefs and "heathen" types of character are somewhat prejudiced and misleading; but the literal way in which Cheng Mao, the "St. Francis" of the story, carries out the teaching of his Master, welcoming poverty, persecution, weariness, and insult in his consuming desire to save the souls of men, makes the comparison with St. Francis a suggestive one.

THE BOOK OF RUTH. By R. H. J. Steuart, S.J. London: David Nutt. 3s. 6d. net.

A FEW lines may suffice for notice of a book which, whatever its merits, is hardly of a kind to interest many readers of THE INQUIRER. It is simply a text-book for the use of those who are learning Hebrew. If the Hebrew text of the Book of Ruth had been printed the word for word translation which is given would have been more useful. So also would the laborious parsing of every Hebrew word, which follows each chapter. And, as the main purpose is to teach Hebrew, the preface might have been omitted. The writer disclaims all idea of dealing with critical questions, but does not refrain from offering some opinions as to the age of the book, which critics would certainly challenge. The author writes from Stonyhurst College, where, presumably, he holds the Hebrew chair. If he has found the method adopted in this book helpful in teaching his students, that is its best recommendation. We hope it may be helpful to others.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By M. Scott Fletcher, M.A., B.Litt. With an Introduction by Hastings Rashdall, D.Litt. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

THIS dissertation is "the result of an attempt to interpret the psychological language and spiritual experiences of the New Testament in terms of modern thought." The task, by no means light, has been accomplished with considerable success. The essential connection in ideas of Old and New Testaments is clearly shown, whilst Pauline contributions to primitive Christian psychology are frankly acknowledged. Students of psychology as well as readers of Scripture will profit by an examination of Mr. Fletcher's linguistic discussions. In his interpretation of the spiritual experiences of the New Testament our author is less convincing. Of Paul it is said that he "literally saw Jesus," but "the manifestation of Christ need not have been in the actual human body." Since the visionary theory of conversion has been rejected, the terms employed in such a conclusion seem to involve some contradiction. A careful index adds to the value of the book, which should prove helpful and interesting to the student of the New Testament too frequently tempted to lose himself in historical and textual problems.

POLITICS AND RELIGION. By Gabriel Gillett. London: Edward Arnold. 3s. 6d. net.

AMIDST the clash of political parties, and face to face with grave social problems, the Christian, called on every side to speak out, would do well, before he make his voice heard, to study this highly suggestive book. With Mr. Gillett's conception of Christianity, Liberal Christians can have little sympathy, nor can Nonconformists generally be expected to acquiesce in some of his strictures upon their political partizanship. But the reader of "Politics and Religion," whether Conservative, Liberal, or Socialist, may learn much from a singularly sober and profoundly Christian treatment of a topic as interesting as it is important to every member of the Church universal.

WE are informed by the publishers of the Hibbert Journal that the Rev. the Hon. Edward Lyttelton, Headmaster of Eton, has accepted the place on the Hibbert Editorial Board left vacant by the death of Dr. Stubbs, late Bishop of Truro.

DR. JAMES GAIRDNER, who died on Monday last at the age of 84, was probably best known to the general reader as the editor of the Paston Letters. Though he was an historical scholar of unusual distinction, his writing never brought him popular fame, and his attempts to use the materials which he had collected from the records of the past had little literary charm and were marred by an ecclesiastical prejudice which seemed often to warp his judgment. But his name will live in connection with his magnificent work at the Record Office. His life-long labours, which have set a standard of accuracy and based the history of England upon a secure foundation of documents, will be the praise and the despair of students for many generations.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

NEVER TOO LATE TO LEARN.

IT is the garden to Mrs. Gay's cottage, and the beeman has come over from Row Common to take the honey for her. She has but two hives, and one she will keep till next year, hoping to get a swarm from it in May, which, as you know, is "worth a load of hay." The granddame of the hamlet, now seventy-nine years of age, lost her husband twenty years ago. She has had a very large family, ten of whom are living, and of these all married but two, who share her home; good-tempered Sarah with the rosy cheek-bones, and Tom the carter on Giles's farm. "How many grandchildren, do you want to know? Well, I sits and counts them up sometimes," she remarks chuckling, and mother and daughter set to work for the hundredth time to calculate the size of the family. "Fred has seven," says Sarah. "And George seven," says her mother, "and Ted six." "And Ben five," adds the other. "And Will two, and David two, and John one." "That's thirty," says the beeman. "Now add their parents and the rest of your own family; that makes forty, and the wives and husbands of those who are married brings it up to forty-eight." "And one great-grandchild," cries the mother of all with proud glee. "Forty-nine," replies the teller, "and you count one, I suppose, which makes fifty. Bravo! the race of Englishmen is not going to die out yet—not in the country. And now for the bees who are also family-folk in a large way. Which hive shall we take?"

Down the slip of grass path that divides the potato patch on the one side from the cabbages and carrots and parsnips on the other go mother and daughter and beeman, consulting as to which hive shall be taken and which left. The old lady thinks it should be the older skep with the last swarm. "We'll try their weights," says the beeman, stepping behind the hives, and proceeding to lift one; but they are both firmly glued to the floorboards. The beeman takes out of his satchel his "smoker," an instrument consisting of a small pair of bellows, having a metal chamber with a conical nose in front. Then lighting a roll of corduroy paper, he shuts it up smouldering in the chamber of the bellows. Now he goes to the hives again, and pumps two or three puffs into the doorway of each. Ah! what a commotion inside. The aged woman presses forward to hear the hum; she has never seen that sort of engine at work before. "That's to make them silly, I suppose, isn't it?" "No," says the beeman, and explains that he does not want to make the bees silly, still less to stifle them, as people used to do, so destroying more than half their stock every year in order to get the honey. "No need to do that," says he, "and we never want to kill anything if we can help it, do we?"

"No, that we don't. I can't abear the thought of killing the poor little things that have made the honey for us," says she, "but I didn't know as how you could get it in any other way."

"Well, when we want a loaf of bread we don't usually go to the baker's shop with a crowbar in our hand, and knock the baker down flat and then take what loaves we like, do we?" said he.

"No, no," she replied, "we shouldn't have any bread next day if we did."

"That whiff of smoke," said the beeman, as he stooped and gave each hive another puff, which produced another fiz of excitement inside, "is a touch of witchcraft to make the bees think their house is on fire. Now what would you do if your house was on fire? You would gather up all the valuables you could carry, and take them to a place of safety, wouldn't you? Well, that's what the bees are doing. They think their house is on fire. They all rush to the stores and load themselves with their wealth, that is, honey, which they carry in a special bag, distinct from their stomach, and when we give them a chance to carry it into another safe place they'll do so. Don't be afraid; they are not going to carry off all the honey and leave you nothing but empty combs. They'll only take a very little, which you will not miss, and it's nothing but fair that they should have the first helping, isn't it?"

"Yes, indeed, I should think it is," said she. "So they fill their little crops with honey, ay?"

All this time the neighbour, a young woman, with a wee girl in her arms and an urchin in red overall at her side, was watching and listening from over the low fence which divided the two gardens.

"I must come over to see better," she exclaimed, and she came round, bringing the two little ones with her. "My husband talks of keeping bees," she added, "but there, he's that afraid of them."

Meanwhile the beeman had run his knife round the edge of the hives so as to separate them from the floor-boards, and was hafting them to judge the amount of honey within. The effective way in which the hive was glued to the board excited interest.

"Wax?"

"No, not wax, but a special cement made from the gum of fruit trees, chestnut buds and the like. Not only cement, but varnish too, to coat the inside of the skep to keep it dry."

"Who'd believe it now!" exclaimed the old lady.

Then the beeman lifted the hives in turn, feeling their weight and looking inside them; and having decided on taking the honey from the old skep with the last swarm, he carried it to an open space on the cabbage bed, and set it upside down in an empty bucket. Taking from his bag his "driving irons," consisting of a sharp iron spike and two rods with their ends bent in and sharpened, he used them in fixing to the upturned skep another empty straw hive, so that it would form a hood set half-way back. Into this the bees would now have to be driven, so that the honey comb might be taken without injuring them or exciting them to sting. How was that to be done?

The beeman squatted on his heels and began patting, rapidly and smartly, the sides of the upturned beehive. Most of the bees were out of sight, hidden between the walls of the comb, but after a few minutes they began to hurry to the top, and run about excitedly. One ventured up into the empty skep, took a run round and returned, then came back with two or three more, then more followed, and the few became many, and an ever increasing throng was hurrying to the new refuge. Right up to the top they ran, and there stopped and held on till the skep roof was lined with bees, and newcomers had to hold on to their comrades and others on to them. Meanwhile the beeman continued to pat vigorously, growing warm with his task. It was on one of those perfect forenoons, early in October, when the air was crisp, but so full of clear sunshine, that the thermometer exposed to the rays rose to ninety-three degrees. The beeman felt the hot sunbeams beating down on his back. He broke off a cabbage leaf and laid it under his cap, a cool protector of his neck. The bees were flying about his head, settling on his bare arms and face, yet not one attempted to sting. Grandmother's curiosity was increasing, and she crept nearer and nearer.

"Aren't you afraid?" exclaimed the neighbour, seeing her press forward to within a foot or two of the teeming hive.

"I want to learn all about them," she replied,

"They'll not hurt you," said the beeman, "they are too busy carrying their honey from their smoky earthquake-shaken house to stop and quarrel with us. Besides, they've got their crops full, and when folk have their crops full of excellent food they have little inclination to be spiteful and angry."

Then a great dumbledore, dressed in black and yellow banded fur, flew down with hum of delight into the mine of sweetness, and disappeared between the combs to steal a rich sip from the brimming cells. As she came up again the beeman caught her and caged her, a booming prisoner, in the hollow of his two hands. He held her close to the wondering urchin, and let her squeeze out from between thumb and finger and escape; but only to return straightway to the honey mine.

The upturned hive had been so placed that the sun shone fully on to the edge over which the bees were still streaming upwards. Upon this spot the beeman kept his eyes fixed. He was searching for the queen, whom he wanted to capture. The reason for this was that the now homeless population would have to be united with another colony already possessing a queen. But two queen bees can no more live together in one hive than two queens could sit on the throne of Great Britain. In the case of the former there would be a royal duel ending in the death of one or both rivals. So one has to be caught and removed.

And now the cottager's wrinkled face is close beside the beeman's as they bend together in a mist of singing wings. "I must see the queen," she said, "I've never seen one before."

And as the two continue to watch the fervent stream of life, the master describes to his aged pupil what the queen is like, the attention and reverence with which she is treated, and the size of her enormous family. "Bigger even than yours," says he, "for if she lives out her full time, until she is a veteran of five long summers, she may become the mother of more than a million children."

The stream of brownies was getting thinner now on the track, but from the roof of their new rereat they were hanging in a dense musical mass many layers thick. Nevertheless, hundreds were still filling their honey pouches, and still the queen had not appeared. At last, "There she is!" But in a trice she was gone again. She had burrowed under a cluster of bees. The beeman's fingers followed her, scattering them to right and left, and in another instant he was holding her majesty gently but firmly between finger and thumb, and showing her to his aged pupil.

The combs were soon cleared now, and the bees in their new home, set on the old stand. At the cottage door the beeman takes out the comb dripping with molten gold, and lays it in slabs on a dish, ramming a luscious block into the mouth of each of the children.

"I do be fond of bees," says grandmother. "I think they're God's little children very much as we are, and I never could abear to think of them having to be killed to get their honey, and they never shall be any more, not any of mine. We read in the Bible, don't we, that the disciples gave the blessed Saviour broiled fish and honeycomb to eat, so it must be good, though I must say I couldn't eat them together myself."

"No," said the beeman, "I don't think any of us could. I believe what is called 'honeycomb' in Luke's Gospel is a kind of bread which is made still in the East, and is called 'honeycomb' because it is so porous."

"Ah, now I understand," said she. "I always did think that was rather strange. But there, we live to learn, don't we? And I'm much obliged to you for telling me that, and I've learnt a deal to-day that I never knew before."

One thing only remained to be done. Later in the day the beeman rode over again, and tied the skep of driven bees in a cloth and took them home on his bicycle. Then he opened one of his own wooden hives, gave a few magic puffs of smoke, and lifting up the frames of comb one by one dusted the bees over with flour. Next he laid a sloping platform, using a large box lid, up to the hive door, and emptied out the driven bees like a basken of grain on to it, flouring them also till they were as white as millers. The heap of living atoms spread out towards the edge of the board. Some went forward and made inquiries at the door of the tenanted hive, and finding a friendly welcome, promptly carried back word to the host that here was a real good home and plenty of friends. Forthwith the floury multitude turned their faces thither, and presently there was a perfect stampede for the door. In half-an-hour they were all in but a scattering on the alighting board amid a melodious surge of welcome and contentment.

But why did the beeman flour them all? So that they should not be able to distinguish stranger from kinsman, friend from foe. All floured alike, all looked and smelt alike. But for this little trick there would have been a desperate battle, hundreds would have been slain at the doorway, and the rest of the newcomers driven away. So trifling is the thing sometimes that separates enmity from friendship.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

STRIKING SUCCESS OF THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

OUR advertisement columns to-day bear witness to the striking success of the effort to raise a sum of £50,000 in order to increase the salaries of duly-accredited and underpaid ministers, whose names appear in the Essex Hall Year Book. The movement was started at the meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Congregations in Birmingham last April. A committee, with the Rev. J. Harwood as secretary, was formed, and private work carried on with admirable energy and enthusiasm enables it now to come before the world with a record of financial support of which it has every reason to be proud. The initial stages having been crowned with such splendid success, a general appeal for support is made to the public, and especially to all the members of congregations associated in the National Conference. It is hoped that those who can only give small gifts will come forward without delay. They will help to swell the total amount, and as an expression of generosity and goodwill the widow's mite has as high a value as the big cheques of the wealthy. We believe that steps are being taken to organise a large subscription list throughout the country, which will be thoroughly representative of all the interests concerned.

The following are the chief features of the scheme:—

To increase the capital of the Sustentation Fund so as to secure for every accredited Minister in England and Wales who is doing an adequate amount of work a minimum stipend on the following scale:—

For towns and populous places in England	150	0	0
For cities and large towns in England	175	0	0
For agricultural districts in Wales	110	0	0
For towns and populous places in Wales	140	0	0

The conditions on which the Fund will be administered must tend towards raising the standard of the Ministry, and stimulating the efforts of assisted congregations. The following conditions are laid down:—

- The minister must be an accredited minister (not a "lay-worker") whose name appears in the Essex Hall Year Book.
- His work must be deemed efficient and his field of work deemed adequate.

(c) The local contribution (apart from endowments) must be considered satisfactory.

(d) The fact and amount of grants from the Sustentation Fund must be published.

Donations may be made payable in annual instalments extending over five years. Annual subscriptions towards the income of the Fund will also be gladly received.

The officers of the committee for raising the Fund are Hugh R. Rathbone, Chairman; H. Enfield Dowson, Vice-Chairman; F. W. Monks, Treasurer; James Harwood, Secretary.

It is requested that all communications, except cheques, be addressed to the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., 60, Howitt-road, Hampstead, London, N.W.

Cheques should be crossed, made payable and sent to the Treasurer, Mr. F. W. Monks, Stonecroft, Appleton, Warrington.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

THE school concerts were duly given on October 30 and 31. An interesting programme had been arranged, and the performance was well up to the usual high standard of the school in matters musical. The orchestra, strengthened by the addition of the music teachers, had a good deal to do, and did it well, especially on the second day, when a really good performance was given of such a delicate piece as Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music. The Andante of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony was another attractive number, the "surprise" in particular being completely successful. The choir happens to be weak at present, but was well balanced, and sang unaccompanied part songs very nicely indeed. Three of the music teachers gave a portion of one of Schubert's piano-forte trios—one of the best items in a strong programme. An unusual feature was some viola solos by Miss Dorothy Jones, sister of the headmaster, and of Mr. Darbishire Jones, the well-known cellist. These were beautifully rendered, and were very obviously appreciated, as was the singing of the headmaster and of S. K. Ruck. The latter is the possessor of a treble voice that any choir would be glad to secure.

The second part of the programme consisted entirely of compositions by the headmaster (Mr. H. Lang Jones). These comprised a march written to commemorate the completion of the school's tenth year, part songs, unison songs sung by the whole school, settings of two of Shakespeare's songs, for solo (with orchestra) and trio respectively, a descriptive piece for orchestra and vocal quartet, entitled "Christmas Eve," a setting of Henley's "England, my England," for full chorus and orchestra, a viola solo, and two songs sung by the composer. The rendering of these numbers was excellent, especially at the evening concert; and the appreciation of the audience was evident.

The attendance was good at the afternoon performance, and better still on the following day. After payment of certain necessary expenses—the hire of chairs and cost of printing—there will be a sum of seven or eight pounds to hand over to the treasurer of the Old Presbyterian Chapel as a contribution to the Restoration Fund. As the experiment of giving a public concert at the school has proved a success, it is proposed to repeat it every year, if possible—there will be no difficulty in finding suitable objects on which to bestow any profit that may be made.

On Saturday, November 2, the Rev. W. H. Drummond visited the school and gave a finely illustrated lantern lecture on "A Roman Town in Africa." The subject was appropriate in view of the headmaster's special interest in Roman archæology. Mr. Drummond also took the school service on the following Sunday morning.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

REPORT FOR THE SEASON OF 1912.

THE Van Mission has now completed its seventh year, and, happily, there seems to be no diminution of the interest which from the outset it occasioned. For those engaged in the actual field work, in addition to the interest which they share with others there is a still growing sense of the necessity for a mission with the wide outlook which has been preserved throughout. The season opened with a month's meetings which promised, if continued, to surpass the best year's record. Then came the break in the weather lasting through a dreary succession of weeks in which the high anticipations gradually fell away leaving in their place a feeling that under such conditions vanning was scarcely worth while. There were weeks and places in which for three and four succeeding nights no meetings could be held; places where the site was under water at the time announced for the meeting. Not until September did the summer make amends, and then the time was too short to overtake the leeway. The summer of 1912 will be remembered as that in which over a hundred meetings were lost. Bearing in mind these untoward conditions, the difficulties of carrying on Mission work in the London area in the midst of the strike district, and of industrial troubles elsewhere, it is gratifying to note that the season yet stands well with its predecessors, and that it has actually exceeded in its averages the record of 1911. The total counted attendances were within a few thousands of last season's and the number of meetings, whilst smaller, was as large as could have been expected.

Many of the visiting ministers have written that the work in some ways has been more successful than in previous years. These communications suggest that the Mission has in a new way generally felt itself to be the master of the situation. More organised opposition has been met with, and a good deal of bitterness has been shown in places; but usually even in such centres the Mission has got home to the sympathies of the majority in a helpful and permanent way. Frequently, too, there was a greater warmth in the welcome for the message than has been customary and expressions of gratification and gratitude from audiences have been numerous and outspoken. Stout opponents at the beginning of a week have become almost friends and advocates ere its close. Atheists have publicly testified; orthodox speakers have moved votes of thanks; ministers in a few instances have spoken, and many times have been sympathetic if silent listeners; requests for return visits have been many; and in some places the interest has been sufficient to justify representations to the local Societies in favour of further work being attempted. For Bridlington the Yorkshire Union and the Missionary Conference have under consideration the possibility of winter lectures, a nucleus of men formerly connected with the Progressive League holding themselves responsible for local co-operation. In Plaistow a score of men formed a Unitarian Mission Band, and open air meetings were continued until well on into September, and will be resumed in the spring, the men meanwhile associating themselves with an Adult Class at the Stratford school. At Muswell Hill a correspondence was carried on in the local paper until October, and the London District Society is at present holding a course of week-evening lectures in a public hall there. At Maesteg a free society of men over a hundred strong was formed after the visit of the Van a few years ago. The Pioneer Preachers held a Mission there this summer, and a few weeks afterwards the Van was on the spot. There is now a probability that the Society will become affiliated with the South-East Wales Society which has also under consideration work in other places where successful meetings have been held. Other suggestions have been forwarded to the local authorities at the instance of individual ministers.

Missions were conducted in seventy-five towns, villages, and London districts. The lay missionaries were, for London, Mr. Arthur Barnes, of Stockport, who has taken part in the work during five seasons; for the Midlands, Councillor Cameron, of Accrington, who, in addition acted as full missionary for three weeks; for Yorkshire Mr. Charles Smith, of Bootle, who is now preparing for the work of the active ministry; and for Wales, Mr. John Crookall, of Preston. The duties of the lay missionaries call for constant carefulness and have never been more efficiently discharged. Large numbers of persons signed the Visitors' Book, and considerable use has again been made of the Free Lending Library. Over 200,000 tracts and leaflets were given away, and a quantity of books and pamphlets have been sold.

The appeal for subscriptions has usually to be made after the van work is over. There is little opportunity for looking after funds while the Mission is at its height. Now, however, the appeal is urgent, and the time is short. The work has been well done, the Mission has been successful, and the funds have been carefully administered. Last year a saving of over £100 was effected, and, though it was expected that this year the cost would largely exceed that of 1911, it is only some £10 higher—say £830, which covers salaries maintenance, haulage, travelling, and literature. The greater part of the money required has still to be collected—over £400. Before Christmas therefore it is hoped that the friends and well-wishers of the Mission will help their utmost, and enable the Committee to meet the whole of the expenditure without trenching upon the ordinary funds of the Association. All communications should be sent to the

AN OPEN-AIR CAMPAIGN FOR LONDON.

A meeting was held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, under the chairmanship of the Rev. Charles Roper, for the purpose of discussing proposals for a great open-air campaign in London next summer. The movement is an extension of the Van Mission, and an address was delivered by the Missionary Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, in which he outlined the plan and invited the assistance of young men and women as speakers and lieutenants. It is intended that a minimum of four hundred meetings shall be arranged, and during the winter months classes will be held at Essex Hall on Wednesday nights at 7.45 for speaking practice and study. There has been a very gratifying response to Mr. Spedding's invitation, and it is hoped that as the scheme becomes known other young men and women who are interested in out-door mission work will join. Mr. Bertram Talbot, who was associated with Mr. Spedding in the early years of the Van Mission movement, is to act as secretary, and inquiries as to membership of this new branch of the work should be addressed to him or to Mr. Spedding, marked "Open-Air" at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand.

SOUTHERN ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

THIS Committee has granted certificates of recognition to the following ministers:—

REV. ERNEST EDWARD COLEMAN, M.A.—Mr. Coleman was formerly a Baptist minister, and has latterly been tutor of the Pioneer Preachers, organised by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and now associated with a committee of Unitarians, and recognised by the B. and F. U. Association.

REV. FRED WOOLLEY, who for the last four years has been in charge, as lay worker, of the Belfast Domestic Mission.

REV. FRANK COLEMAN, who for the last three years has been lay worker at Wareham, and has passed the examinations in the course of reading prepared by the National Conference.

WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

A UNITED demonstration of men and women under the auspices of no less than 43 different societies, to urge the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill in an effective form this session, will be held at the London Opera House, Kingsway, on Tuesday, November 12, at 8 o'clock. The Archbishop of Canterbury will preside, and the speakers will be the Bishop of Birmingham, Lady Barlow, Mrs. F. D. Acland, Mr. D. L. Alexander, K.C., Mrs. General Booth, the Rev. Dr. Scott Lidgett, Mr. Claude J. G. Montefiore, Dr. Mary Murdoch, Mrs. E. E. Nott-Bower, and Mr. Edward Smallwood, J.P., L.C.C. The doors will be open at 7.15, admission free. Tickets for reserved seats, of which there is a limited number, at 1s. and 2s. 6d., and further information can be obtained from the Secretary, Pass the Bill Committee, 19, Tothill-street, Westminster, S.W.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED. THE INQUIRER FUND.

MISS DENDY, hon. secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-Minded, acknowledges with thanks further contributions to our Fund as follows:—

Two Friends	£0 10 0
Mrs. Armstrong	1 1 0
Mrs. Thornely	2 2 0
An INQUIRER Reader	0 5 0
Already acknowledged	194 9 6

Donations may be sent to Miss Dendy, at 13, Clarence-road, Withington, Manchester.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE SOCIAL EVIL AND THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

The recent discussions which have centred round the White Slave Traffic ought not to blind us to the fact that this detestable form of commerce is but one aspect of a wider problem, which, disagreeable as it is, must be faced. We may by drastic legislation banish from our shores the bully, the souteneur, and the professional trafficker in young womanhood, but we shall still have with us a number of native-born persons and influences seeking whom they may devour. Two of the most painful, because so judicial and so unanswerable, documents which throw light upon these dark places of our modern civilisation have come to us earlier this year from the United States. But the tale which they tell might, with the necessary alteration of names and places, be told of every big town in the British Islands and on the Continent of Europe.

"A NEW CONSCIENCE AND AN ANCIENT EVIL."

Miss Jane Addams, of Hall House, Chicago, whom everybody agrees to call the ablest and most useful woman in the States, found herself in the course of her settlement work brought into contact with special investigations into the dangers surrounding young girl life in large cities. In "A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil" she has set down the tabulated experiences of defenceless immigrant girls, and of female employees in great stores, offices, hotels, and restaurants, whom the tempter so often plies with his solicitations. The result of these impartial inquiries proves incontestably, what is also true for the British Islands, that the destroyer is only too often of native birth, and possibly, so far as the general public knows, of "respectable" position.

"THE SOCIAL EVIL."

Another aspect of this, the most shameful blot upon our modern life, is discussed in "The Social Evil," the report of the New York Committee of Fifteen, prepared in 1902, and re-issued with new material in the present year under the editorship of Professor E. R. A. Seligmann. The investigations which led up to this valuable work convinced the Committee that the social evil as we know it, is to a large extent the product of modern social and industrial conditions. Two facts, in their view, clearly emerged as a result of their inquiries. A large number of those who lead the life of shame may, in a sense, be said to have been trained for it from their earliest childhood, as, for instance, foundlings, orphans, and those who, because they have grown up in overcrowded tenements, have been familiar with scenes of vice. The second fact is that large numbers of women add to their income in undesirable ways because their normal earnings are totally insufficient to meet urgent daily needs. Many of these belong to great concerns, which pay huge dividends and could well afford to pay a living wage, but do not.

Professor Seligmann and his collaborators are of opinion that if we are to deal with the social evil in all its ramifications, we must rely not so much on direct methods as on a more rational system of education, the reduction of overcrowding, and the improvement of the material conditions of wage-earning women and girls.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bedfield.—On Sunday, October 27, services were held at the Unitarian Chapel in connection with the twentieth anniversary. The preacher in the afternoon was the Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis, of Gainsborough, and in the evening the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, minister-in-charge. Special hymns were rendered by the scholars of the Sunday school. On Monday, October 28, the annual public meeting was held. Miss Tagart occupied the chair, and addresses were given by Miss F. Hill, the Revs. W. R. Clark-Lewis, H. C. Hawkins, and H. J. Easter, a neighbouring Baptist minister. The minister's annual report recorded much successful work during the past year. An entertainment followed.

Boys' Own Brigade: London Battalion.—A united religious service for boys was held at Essex Church on Sunday evening, November 3, when 116 boys and officers of the B.O.B. London companies, and nine boys, with two teachers, from the Hackney Sunday school, were present, in addition to the ordinary congregation. The service was conducted, and a special address was delivered, by the Rev. H. E. B. Speight.

Framlingham.—The 252nd anniversary was celebrated at the Old Meeting House on Sunday, October 27, when the sermon was preached in the morning by the minister, the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, and by the Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis, of Gainsborough, in the evening. On Wednesday, October 30, a public meeting and entertainment took place. The minister presided, and addresses were given by Miss Tagart and the Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis. The minister's report recorded the maintenance of a regular evening service started last November, the establishing of a Band of Hope of 65 members, and a girls' club, presided over by Mrs. Hawkins. The progress of the work had been satisfactory, considering the local difficulties. The need for help in promoting the work at Framlingham is very urgent, and Mr. Hawkins makes an appeal on behalf of the Band of Hope and library, and the Old Meeting Girls' Club. The latter, which was started twelve months ago, and has a good number of members who meet twice a week, specially requires a piano to provide music for physical drill. The library contains only 50 books, but as the members of the Band of Hope number over 60 it is obvious that the stock has become exhausted. Books dealing with travel, adventure, biography, &c., as well as bound volumes of magazines for boys and girls, would be gratefully received.

London: Finchley.—The first anniversary of the opening of Granville Hall will be celebrated on Sunday, November 10, when the Rev. Joseph Wood (late of Birmingham) will preach both morning and evening. The members of the congregation will be "At Home" at Granville Hall to friends at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when there will be a short musical programme.

New Zealand: Dunedin.—The Rev. W. F. Kennedy writes as follows:—"We have recently had the pleasure of a visit from the Rev. W. Jellie, of Wellington. This was arranged by the Unitarian Conference of New Zealand, and has been the means of still further strengthening our newly formed cause. Mr. Jellie preached on Sunday to a good congregation, and gave a lecture next evening on 'The Ring and the Book.' A social gathering followed, which enabled many friends to make the acquaintance of our visitor. Among the audience was an old farm hand, who walked in three and a half miles in bad weather to hear the lecture."

Nottage.—We regret to record the death, on October 28, of Mary, widow of Mr. Wm. Phillips, of Newton Nottage, near Bridgend, at the age of 86. She came of an old Unitarian family, which has contributed many valued members to the ministry. Her father was the Rev. Titus Lloyd, minister of Nottage and Wick, 1847-79, and the Rev. Evan Lloyd, minister of the same churches 1808-47, was her grandfather. She had three brothers in the ministry, Titus Lloyd, a lay minister, who did good work in his day in connection with Nottage; Evan William Lloyd, minister first at Blaengwrach, and later, for 30 years, at Cwmbach; and John Briggs Lloyd, of Knutsford. Her son, William John, has now been minister of Nottage for many years, and his son, Priestley, is at present a student at the Home Missionary College at Manchester, preparing to follow in their footsteps. Mrs. Phillips was a lifelong and devoted member of the church at Nottage, a constant attendant at the services, and a worker in the Sunday school as long as her strength lasted. On Friday, November 1, at the funeral, which was largely attended, a service was held at the house and in the parish churchyard, where the interment took place. The Revs. R. J. Jones, Simon Jones, and Park Davies officiated. Last Sunday the Rev. R. J. Jones conducted a memorial service at Nottage.

Yarmouth.—A successful bazaar, in aid of the improvements fund, was held on Thursday, October 31, in the school-room of the Old Meeting Church. The Rev. A. J. Walkden (United Methodist) presided, and the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. Hare Paterson, wife of the minister.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE AGE OF THE MIND.

A good deal is being said about mental deficiency at the present time, and most of us have begun to realise that it is becoming more and more difficult to draw the line between people who are normal and those who are on the borderline of feeble-mindedness, if not actually irresponsible. The great French psychologist, Binet, has, however, thrown a good deal of light on the subject, which ought to make the task of the social reformer considerably easier, by devising a method of measuring inherent native intelligence, irrespective of the results of training. Thus it is possible to find out exactly how much is to be expected from different types of mind. An interesting account is given in the World's Work of certain experiments carried on at the Training School for Backward and Feeble-Minded Children at Vineland, New Jersey, where what is known as the Binet-Simon test is habitually applied.

It would appear that not only are some minds undeveloped all through life, but many minds stop growing at a very early stage, although the body does not, the result being that numbers of men and women whom we treat as grown-up people have only twelve or eight-year-old brains. Here is the result of treating one hundred delinquents in one of the juvenile courts, who came to the detention home in a fair-sized city of the United States. "One, ten years old in body, was also ten years old in mind. He was the only normal child in the whole hundred. Also, though among the youngest of the group physically, he was among the oldest mentally. Six boys of thirteen years tested only ten. Twenty-six of fourteen tested also ten. Twenty of fourteen years tested nine. Eighteen of fifteen and sixteen years averaged under nine. One youth, fifteen in body, had only a seven-year-old brain. One brain, eight and two-tenths years of age, found itself in a seventeen-year-old body. . . . Fifty-six wayward young women from another institution tell the same story," and these were all apparently normal persons, "the sort one finds at work everywhere in factory, shop, and household." Some of the facts given in this instructive article are not a little startling. Obviously, if they are true, the burden of social injustice is increased, and numbers of people are being harshly punished for misdeeds which are only what one would expect in undeveloped and childish individuals.

THE STEAD MEMORIAL.

It was decided last week at a meeting over which Earl Grey presided that the memorial to Mr. W. T. Stead should take the form of hostels for women to be known as the Stead Hostels. The need for an increase in the number of places where women can find shelter and protection is constantly being pointed out, and many influential people have cordially endorsed the proposal which was strongly urged by Lord Grey. Although the scheme is to be international in scope, it is proposed to work in co-operation with the National Association for Women's Lodging Houses.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ITALY.

A correspondent of the Manchester Guardian draws attention to the grave problem of unemployment in Italy—a problem which will increase in gravity as the winter advances. Over the vast alluvial and marshy plain that extends southward from the mouths of the Po, over the provinces of Ferrara and Romagna, unemployment is rife, and mass meetings are emphasising the need for remedial legislation. The vast lowlands of Carpi are seething with unrest, and demonstrations of the unemployed have demanded the putting into execution of official schemes for reclaiming waste lands which have already been elaborated for half a century, and which five years ago were on the point of being begun, but have since been dropped. At Novantola the unemployed reach near 75 per cent.; recently immense crowds traversed the streets with banners and raised the usual cry of the Italian labourer, "Pane e lavoro" (bread and work).

A HENRY MARTYN MEMORIAL.

Bishop Stileman has written to the Times to enlist support for the Henry Martyn Memorial Fund of which the Rev. H. F. Stewart, Dean of St. John's College, Cambridge, is treasurer. Henry Martyn, "great as saint and notable as scholar," as Dr. George Smith has said, gave the Persians in their own tongue the New Testament and the Psalms, and performed a work of faith and love in India which will never be forgotten. The city of Shiraz, in which he lived and worked at his translation, says Bishop Stileman, has no resident Christian missionary at the present time. The Church Missionary Society has endeavoured during the past twelve years to establish a mission there, and much faithful work has been carried on. But the under-staffed condition of its mission in Persia, and the necessity of maintaining the work in Ispahan, Yezd, and Kerman, which had previously been occupied as mission stations, have led to temporary withdrawal from Shiraz.

THE WORLD PEACE FOUNDATION.

We have received a batch of pamphlets from the World Peace Foundation (formerly the International School of Peace) which includes a "Revised List of Arbitration Treaties," compiled by Denys D. Myers, "Concerning Sea Power," by Professor Starr Jordan; "International Good-will as a Substitute for Armies and Navies," by the Rev. William C. Gannett; "The Cosmic Roots of Love," by Henry M. Simmons; and an account of the World Scouts movement, organised by Sir Francis Vane, by Albert Jay Nock. The activities of the World Peace Foundation are being conducted on a large scale. Dr. David Starr Jordan, in addition to the innumerable lectures he has delivered in all parts of America, has lately rendered conspicuous service to the cause during a visit to Japan and Korea, when he delivered sixty-four addresses in the course of seven weeks, assisting in the organisation of branches of the Japan Peace Society at Asaka, Nagoya, Kobe and Okayama, as well as speaking at meetings under the direction of societies already existing in Tokyo and Kyoto. A chief part of the work of the society in China has been the translation and wide circulation of books communicating Western ideas to the Chinese, and over two hundred volumes, comprising history, politics, science, romance, travel and education have been given currency throughout the country.

THE WIRELESS ERA.

Some interesting predictions are made by Mr. Marconi in an interview which appears in Science Siftings as to the benefits which will be brought about by wireless operations within the next two generations. "We shall have not only wireless telegraphy and telephony," he says, "but also wireless transmission of all power for individual and corporate use, wireless heating and light, and wireless fertilising of fields. When all that has been accomplished, as it surely will be, mankind will be free from many of the burdens imposed by present economic conditions. In the wireless era the Government will necessarily be the owner of all the great sources of power. This will naturally bring railways, telegraph and telephone lines, great ocean-going vessels, and great mills and factories into public ownership. It will sweep away the present enormous corporations, and will bring about a semi-Socialistic state." "The coming of the wireless era," Mr. Marconi adds, "will make war impossible, because it will make war ridiculous."

INCREASED COST OF LIVING IN JAPAN.

The cost of living is increasing by leaps and bounds in many countries besides our own. In Japan, owing to the advance of prices brought about by heavy taxation, which affects commodities that are the necessities of life, a very serious state of things has been brought about in the Consular district of Kobé, of which a report has just been issued. Salt, for example, which cost 4s. 1d. to 4s. 8d. per koku (about 5 bushels) in 1894 has increased in price to 10s. 2d.; sugar has advanced from £1 0s. 5d. to £1 12s. 8d. per 100 kin (say 132.27 lbs.); brown sugar from 14s. 3d. to £1 2s. 5d.; kerosene oil from 5s. 3d. to 8s. 2d. per case; and soy from £1 6s. 6d. to £2 6s. 11d. per koku (40 gallons nearly). Even rice, which is the staple diet of the people, shows an increase of 20 to 30 per cent. in price, which is sometimes forced up to 50 to 60 per cent. in times of bad crops; ground rents and house rents have doubled during the last decade, and much distress ensue in consequence.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is with strong and affectionate regard that we desire to associate ourselves with the congratulations which have been offered to the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke on his eightieth birthday. From the day when in the Life of Robertson of Brighton he produced one of the great biographies of modern times, he has been a distinctive force in the religious life of the country. No one has done more than he to forge links of sympathy between artists and writers and the exponents of a spiritual Christianity. His "Theology in the English Poets," delivered as Sunday afternoon lectures in 1872, initiated a new style in pulpit literature, and in spite of the riper criticism of his later years it is still the portal through which many ardent spirits enter into the shrine of Wordsworth's poetry.

* * *

If Mr. Brooke has been chiefly an interpreter of the great lovers of beauty, Blake, Wordsworth, Shelley, Turner, and chiefly perhaps of the noblest passages of the Bible, he has always added something of his own, and every word has borne the impress of his personality, "radiant with ardour divine." Dowered with the spirit of immortal youth, he has drawn from inexhaustible wells of pure emotion for the gladdening of the world. And with him, as with all who sway the hearts of men for spiritual ends, emotion has been tempered in the fires of a sensitive conscience. If to-day we think of him chiefly as the highly gifted poet among modern preachers and congratulate him on his glad success, it is also with gratitude for the confidence and strength which he won through sacrifice, when he left the church of his fathers, and all the brilliant future it held for himself, and went forth like a pilgrim into a strange land. Perhaps we may assure him here that the dwellers in the wilderness have not been unmindful of the preciousness of the gift.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made for a prolonged and elaborate inquiry into the condition and prospects of the Evangelical Free Churches. The report, which it is hoped will contain recommendations for closer co-operation and a readjustment of doctrine and method in view of the needs of the modern world, will not be ready for at least two years. The re-statement of doctrine, which is to be considered under the chairmanship of Professor Peake, will probably give rise to the greatest difficulties, and it may be doubted whether thought is not still too chaotic for the task to be attempted in such a formal way. The departmental history and tradition of the various denominations will also give rise to problems in emotional prejudice, which must be acknowledged quite frankly with a view to their dismissal into relative insignificance, if there is to be real progress in co-operation. But probably one of the most serious difficulties has hardly loomed above the horizon. If evangelical Nonconformity is to grow in influence it must set itself to conquer its spiritual alienation from forms of Christianity which are not of its fashion, and claim its inheritance in the vast spaces of Christian history which, to the great impoverishment of its own life, it has too long ignored.

On the further consideration of the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill in the House of Commons on Tuesday, an attempt to eliminate flogging was defeated by 288 to 74 votes. Subsequently, however, it was decided that flogging should not be inflicted for a first offence by 188 votes to 164. The argument of the Home Secretary that it would not be wise to flog upon a first offence on account of the risk of a miscarriage of justice strikes us as very flimsy, especially in view of his plea that nothing else but flogging will act as a deterrent and protect society from a particularly odious form of crime. The vote, which was probably influenced only in a slight degree by this fear of mistakes, seems to us to reveal the better mind of the House of Commons and its real aversion to crippling the work of penal reform, though unfortunately in this matter it has been only too anxious to serve two masters.

If the pleas which we made against flogging last week need confirmation, they have received it in a most telling form in the speech which the Archbishop of Canterbury made at the great meeting held in the London Opera House last Tuesday. It is almost incredible that the spiritual head of the Church of England, which exists to preach the gospel of the love of God and to minister the redeeming grace of Christ to the sinful, should stand forth as the champion of the lash and seem almost to take a vindictive delight in its use. We can understand though we do not accept the position of those who feel that flogging is a hateful necessity, and that they must humble themselves to accept their full share of the shame and degradation. But the last thing that such people would do is to make flamboyant appeals to the violent instincts of a crowded meeting, or to pour contempt upon the serious and reasoned objections of those who see in this clamour for flogging a dangerous reaction into barbarism. When the Archbishop asked his great audience, "Degrade whom?" and the sorry pessimism of his question was punctuated with cheers, we wish there had been some one to reply, "Your brother and fellow-sinner, for whom Christ died."

THE Report of the Divorce Commission, issued this week, deals with a subject which is very distasteful to all high-minded people, but it is a distinct gain that it will not be treated with the squeamish reticence which would have been its fate a few years ago. The problem is one which men and women must solve together in the light of the experience of the past and of the highest ideal they can form of social welfare and Christian duty, remembering always that the crude and imperfect arrangements of human law are no substitute for the constraint of spiritual affections and the law of God in the heart. On several important points the Report of the Minority, signed by three of the Commissioners and representing the ecclesiastical point of view, agrees with that of the Majority. That the grounds for divorce should be the same for men and women, and that local courts should be provided in order to make the law more equal for rich and poor, are recommendations which will win at once a large measure of acceptance. Controversy will turn upon the extension of the grounds of divorce, and here it would be rash to draw à priori conclusions without a careful survey of the evidence and some comparative study of the working of the law of divorce in other countries.

MRS. RAMSAY MACDONALD'S mother wrote in her commonplace book as her last entry the words "to be strong and beautiful, and to go round making music all the time." The words can appropriately be used to describe the life-work of the daughter whose birth she only survived by a week or two, a Memoir of whom has just been published. Although people are accustomed to think that a great concern with blue books and wages boards, and sweated industries tends to a materialistic view of things, it may rather be the outcome of a soul profoundly in tune with the poetry and rhythm of life. Mrs. Macdonald was, indeed, the embodiment of that sympathy and love which seeks to make the crooked places smooth, and her faith finds simple and poignant expression in the following words:—

"If I had a brother or sister that I loved, degraded in the East End, I should not rest till I had done my utmost to save him, and others would think that that was only to be expected of me; but I have thousands of brothers and sisters there, and I calmly let them be . . . If these people who live there in squalor were hurt in some big accident or afflicted by some epidemic, every one would be all sympathy and generosity; cannot they see that to be born in such surroundings is worse than any big accident, and the sin and hopelessness to which they wake up every day is worse than the most malignant epidemic?"

TO THE WOMEN OF ENGLAND.

To you, ye pitiful women of my land,
To you the call has come—so clear and strong,

There is no answer but the helping hand
Now while the warring hosts their feud prolong,
And blood is shed to anneal an ancient wrong.

To you, ye pitiful women, brave of heart,
Gentle of soul, to whom life gives no choice

But to create; supremely set apart
For love's divinest work—the very voice
Of God has spoken: will ye not rejoice

To hear, while still the sounds of war increase—

To give your wealth, to serve with body and brain

As ministrants and harbingers of peace,
For whom the cry of men distraught with pain

And sorrowing sisters never comes in vain?

Will ye be jealous of the hourly joys
We purchase at the cost of such great woe;

Absorbed in pleasure, satisfied with toys,
Content on soft-shod feet through life to go

While love is slain and all this blood doth flow?

It will not and it must not be, else shame
Would seize the race, and darken every soul.

With you, the guardians of life's sacred flame,

It lies to make the sick world strong and whole,

And lead it onward still to its high goal.

Yours it must be to stem the furious tides
Of lust and hate, to succour every cause
That works for good—not hotly to take sides

In feuds that sunder men, but, without pause,

To foster love and keep the holier laws.

Yours, most of all, to build where those hurl down

Who work destruction, children of fierce hate;

To bind the broken limb, to ease the crown
Of thorns o'er weary eyes, to recreate
Joy, and with beauty touch the lips of fate.

O women of my land—yea, of all lands—
To you the call has come: give ear this day!

The blood of guiltless men is on your hands
In that ye have not raised those hands to stay,

For love of Christ, them that go forth to slay.

And yours the fault, now all the furies break
In ruin on the world, if brave men lie Speechless with pain, and none there are that slake

Their thirst, or watch with them long hours go by,

Filled with the roar of battle, till they die.

Yours is the blame if any go unfed, Shelterless 'neath the sky, their couch
the sod,

Amidst that awful harvest of the dead
Gnawing the dust, supine, less than the clod,

LAURA ACKROYD.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

PLAY THE MAN.*

BY THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

"Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God: and the Lord do that which seemeth him good."
—2 Sam. x. 12.

THE first note of our text is "Courage!" The mere word is a fortifying call that strengthens the heart like the throb of a drum and thrills the soul like battle-music. It comes with the sound of many trumpets, with the thunder of the captains and the shouting. "Courage!" has been the word of life on the lips of commanders, bracing the unstrung nerves of cowards, turning the tide of battle, restoring the confidence of quivering armies and urging them on from disgrace to victory.

It is the heroic quality which redeems a poor cause from shame and makes a good one glorious. It enables us to turn from all failures and fears, and enter upon the future as a domain of epic and romance, full of golden and glorious possibilities. What is unknown, what is impending—this fills all existence with the spirit of enterprise and adventure, makes the universe radiant with expectancy and promise.

The essence of courage, it has been finely said, is to stake our life upon a possibility, and the essence of faith is to believe that the possibility exists. That is a sentence that should be engraven on the heart like a motto on a shield. "As it is of the essence of courage to stake one's life upon a possibility; so it is of the essence of faith to believe that the possibility exists."

There is, doubtless, a time for introspection, for self-examination, for looking inward and examining our motives and purposes. But there is also a time for the more healthy exercise of looking outward and onward, and (to repeat our city's watchword) "Forward." Life comes to most of us as a challenge to a great campaign, and we are often like soldiers on the point of charging. We see our difficulties and our perils, and we stand hesitating perhaps, if not trembling, until the Great Commander cries to our conscience the strengthening word "Courage," and then we throw ourselves bravely on the unseen and the unknown. We are ready to stake our life on a possibility—to risk our fortunes, our career, on the mere may-be that awaits us. We believe without scientific evidence that the may-be holds the prophecy of success and triumph. We commit ourselves with a splendid trust to the mere postulates of our optimism.

In the realm of religion I believe with the late Prof. Wm. James, that may-be's are often of the essence of the situation. "I confess that I do not see why the very existence not only of a life worth living, but of an invisible world, may not in part depend on the personal response which any one of us may make to the religious appeal. God himself may draw vital strength and increase of very being from our fidelity. For my own part, I do not know what the sweat and blood and tragedy of this life means, if they mean anything short of this. If this life be not a real fight, in which something is eternally gained for the universe by success, it is no better than a game of private theatricals, from which one may withdraw at will. But it feels like a real fight—as if there is something really wild in the universe which we, with all our idealities and faithfulnesses are needed to redeem; and first of all to redeem our own hearts from atheisms and fears."

To be fellow-workers then with God in the redemption of the world, that is the sublimest privilege of man. To take up the burden, the privilege, the whole inheritance of our humanity with buoyancy and cheer—that is our moral duty and our divine trust. And for this we need this one thing, "Courage!"

II.

But the text goes on to strike another note. It commands us to "play the man"—that is another heartening word—a vital tonic which may strengthen even the faint with the stern virtue of a virile mind. When we are tempted by our baser passions to do some shabby or cowardly thing, has not a voice sometimes pealed through all our being this reinforcing cry—Play the man. Has it not lifted us up above our weaker nature, with all its insidious evasion and sophistries, to stand erect in our manhood. It is rarely, I think, that a sincere appeal to the native manliness of human nature fails. Seldom do we rely in vain on anyone who has really pledged himself to us on his honour as a man. There is something in the meanest that will respond to our trust and confidence. There is no one who has not left in him some elements of self-respect, some sense of personal dignity—some remnant of responsibility to maintain a standard of human integrity, and to bear the test of the ordinary loyalties of our nature. When other virtues have ceased to attract—when the finer graces of the Christian life seem weak or sentimental—this strong virtue of manliness remains admirable and praiseworthy. It is this manly quality far more than any magic of style which makes the writings of Robert Louis Stevenson an inspired scripture to many readers. Indeed, these very words were often on his lips and in his heart. They symbolise for us his own great conquest over self. He fought against the odds of ill-health and the fretfulness of a frail body, and turned his very weakness into strength. I cannot forbear to quote from two of those simple prayers where his higher spirit most articulately utters itself—where his manliness victoriously dominates all the sickness and pain of the flesh.

"Bless to us our extraordinary mercies," he says; "if the day come when these must be taken, brace us to play the man under affliction. Be with our friends, be with ourselves. Go with each of us to rest; if any awake, temper to them the dark hours of watching; and when day returns, return to us, our Sun and Comforter, and call us up with morning faces and with morning hearts—eager to labour, eager to be happy, if happiness shall be our portion—and if the day be marked for sorrow, strong to endure it." A simple prayer, great with the simplicity of a Christian manliness.

And the other well-known and familiar prayer repeats the same steadfast aspiration: "The day returns and brings us the petty round of irritating concerns and duties. Help us to play the man, help us to perform them with laughter and kind faces; let cheerfulness abound with industry. Give us to go blithely on our business all this day, bring us to our resting beds weary and content and undishonoured, and grant us in the end the gift of sleep."

These are the deep desires and resolves of a happy warrior—they utter for us in different phrase the spirit of our words, "Be of good courage and let us play the man." And did our text end there it would surely prove to us one of fruitful suggestion and quickening stimulus. But it does not end here. As if to warn us against a mistaken view of manliness; as if to assure us that it is not a self-centred virtue, not the hard integrity of a stoical calm; as if deliberately to forbid us the conceit of a mere self-conquest boasting in its own proper worth and exulting in a personal serenity whose lofty sufficiency might flatter our vanity, and yet prove useless to the world; as if to prohibit the pride of self-reliance and to insist on the social and human aspect of real manliness—it goes on to tell us that we are to do this, and to be this, not merely for our own sakes, not in an insular spirit of self-righteousness or of self-realisation, but we are to "be of good courage and play the man for our people and for the cities of our God."

III.

That is the third note of our text on which I wish to dwell. A true Christian must aim at something nobler than a private morality of personal distinction and dignity. A man may affect strength of character, being strong only with the strength of scorn for the vulgar democracy and of contempt for the crowd. A fine critic once said of Arthur Hugh Clough—intending to praise his high indifference to popular applause—"It was not till after he had left the scene that the world at large knew that there had been a poet among them. Then there was much clapping of hands. Could he who . . . passed in behind the veil have returned at our summons to receive our plaudits, we feel persuaded that for such a purpose he would not have relifted the fallen curtain." That was intended to be, and rightly regarded it is, much to Clough's honour. It shows that in pursuit of his vocation he laboured not merely "as unto men." But, carelessly or captiously interpreted, it suggests a certain superior and ungenial disdain of the wishes of fickle men, an aloofness and unconcern which would detract from rather than add to our estimate of character. Such austerity would in its self-sufficiency be too closely akin to pride to be greatly and perfectly manly.

Again, an exquisite purity of personal life has a subtle charm, a rare beauty and appeal of its own. But it is delicate and frail with the loveliness of an exotic flower. Its holiness is allied to the sanctity of a cloistered monk. But true manliness has a certain Puritan quality, and is won "not without dust and heat" amid the bustle of the throng and along the main thoroughfares of our hot and eager life. It must justify itself at the bar of social utility. It must prove itself no mere personal ornament or private possession—no self-adornment, but a human function—a civic, a social, national, virtue that exists and labours for our people and for the cities of our God. It must look out on the objective practical world of secular institutions and temporal interests, and recognise the cause of the people as the cause of God. Christian manliness must not only lift up eyes of adoring worship and breathe its prayers of private consecration; it must also organise our active goodwill, inspire and proclaim our laws, build up our national and local institutions; it must legislate, administer, judge, educate, reform, destroy and fulfil. For it is a true saying that "the chivalry of modern life is the performance of public duty."

Social service is, therefore, one aspect of our Religion. It is faith expressing its vitality in and through good works; it is Christianity at the point of intense application—Christianity in action.

After all what matters supremely—other things matter, indeed—but what matters supremely is not our theories and doctrines, whether theological or political—but that what we believe and think should be held in a certain spirit and temper, and be a sincerely and passionately thought out conviction manifesting itself in life and character and conduct—that our respective loyalties should be the outcome of an ardent and prophetic zeal for justice and purity; the expression of a genuine love of the people—of all the people, not of this or that caste or class; the fruit of an invincible social enthusiasm, of an earnest desire to see our ideals, rather, to see the Christ of our hearts rule, honoured, revered, enthroned in the midst of men.

To make our religion in the best sense—political; to make our politics in the best sense, religious—that ought to be the effort of every British subject who aspires to be worthy of his fair and spacious heritage. That inspired social purpose has been the animating power, the burning flame at the heart of every patriot, of every far-seeing high-principled statesman. High above our doctrinal differences and theoretical antagonisms God sits as King, and in Him we may find our reconciliation and unity. High above, I said, but also intimately within and in the midst of us, our Father worketh hitherto, and we work.

If we cannot bring all our social schemes and ambitions, and lay them down at the footstool of His throne, before His eternal scrutiny, and with the expectation of His blessing, then, whatever theory may be ours, our plans are worthless and vitiated through and through with insincerity. But if we can bring them thus honestly and unafraid into the very Holy of Holies, then, however mistaken our ideas and proposals may be, at least our motives will be pure, our intentions disinterested, our service unselfish. Though the letter of our project should be mistaken, yet the spirit of it will be right and sound, and our very temper and disposition will be a source of strength and moral sustenance to our fellow men.

In speaking as I have done of social service, I have in mind, of course, the duties of all citizens of whatever rank or station—not only those who are called to conspicuous offices of public trust as magistrates, councillors, guardians, and so forth, but beyond and other than all this, I have in mind the humble, yet extremely important civic service which everyone of us, however lowly our lot in life, may render, as ordinary individuals, in willing co-operation and voluntary association with others. The strength of a chain is in its weakest link. No civic authority, no social agency on earth, can be efficient without a supporting atmosphere of public opinion and goodwill, of personal integrity and private vigilance. Not only is it true that you cannot wisely legislate in advance of public opinion, but you cannot permanently administer with efficiency in advance of public opinion. And that public opinion is ultimately just you and I, and thousands of ordinary average people like ourselves. The civic atmosphere is created by our goodwill and intelligence, and knowledge and sympathy and trust. Without these even the bravest and most public-spirited of our leaders must languish and despair.

There are innumerable ways in which we may all engage in work for the public good—and every wise way will be a sacrament—a channel of divine grace to men. To the consideration of civic and national ways and means we ought all to devote some amount of time and thought and study. Someone may think that his or her contribution to the common stock of civic intelligence and enlightenment is so small as to be negligible. But no soul, no mind created by God is ever negligible. What we do with our conscience and intelligence counts; it counts here and in heaven; it goes to the heightening or to the reducing of the level of our common citizenship. The words are, therefore, applicable to all of us. Healthier bodies and purer minds; better homes and cleaner lives; nobler characters, worthier aims, deeper joys, higher ideals. Be of good courage, and let us play the man for these!

Brighter cities, more spaciouly and more beautifully planned, better government, honester commerce, gladder industries, juster conditions of life and labour, more joyous mirth, more dignified leisure, more wholesome recreation; gentler, fairer childhood, fuller of laughter and innocence and purity. Let us play the man for our people and for the cities of our God!

IV.

And, having done our best for these, and similar social and civic ends; ever vowing our best and utmost for the Highest; letting nothing blunt the edge of our enthusiasms—then we may leave the final issue, confidently, faithfully to God. The Lord do that which seemeth Him good.

What a grand note; rather, what a sonorous chord of trust is that! The Lord do that seemeth Him good! We cannot know the far off results of our conduct. We cannot forecast the future. We live in too small a corner of time, and even centuries cannot tell us finally of the trend of everlastingness. The results of our labours are in the control of a wiser than ourselves. The ultimate vision is left to our faith. We anticipate all the proofs and demonstrations. The best is ever left to our trust; and we wait wisely when we wait in confidence and in patience. Into God's hands we must commend our spirit and our work. To Him we may all now dedicate ourselves and whatever service it may be given to us to render for our brother men and for our fellow-citizens. We must stipulate for no immediate victories, and be content to receive the wages of going on, glad to serve in the campaign, and taking all its risks and hazards with a firm faith that for those who love all things work together for good.

My friends, I give you a great text. With it I give you the greeting which the knights of ancient chivalry gave to each other when they met in the forest or on the road: God give you joy and good adventure!

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

DAWN IN DARKEST AFRICA.*

THE "Congo Horrors," in the restricted sense of the phrase, are no more. Torture, mutilation, and outrage are no longer practised in the Congo as integral and normal features of an organised scheme of industry run for the profit of Europeans. They could never have arisen or been maintained but for the callousness of Europe, but they would probably have lasted a little longer than they did if that callousness had been complete. Public opinion, then, has done something, and when enlightened, consolidated and organised, it may do much more; but the public conscience will not have to trust to its unaided strength, for it is clear that so far from there being any natural antagonism between human sympathies and commercial interests, the missionary who takes himself as the friend and educator of the native, and the merchant who looks for steady and permanently growing rather than ruinously quick returns, are each other's natural allies. King Leopold's hideous system broke down commercially, for it has not only destroyed the rubber forests but has almost denuded the vast area which it polluted of the hands and brains without which the prodigality of nature is not wealth. As a commercial system, Leopold's methods rank with those of the highwayman. They may effect a rapid acquisition of wealth, but they can only ruin its production. Humane feeling, then, has an ally in enlightened commercial enterprise, but this latter will not do its work for it. Barbarous and short-sighted methods of industry, of legislation, and of education have a terrible vitality; and men who are deaf to the appeals of humanity are generally blind to their own permanent interests. Still, it is a great thing to have such an overwhelming body of evidence as is gradually accumulating (and Mr. Harris's new book "Dawn in Darkest Africa" very substantially augments it) to the effect that in pleading with our Colonial Office to make itself "the refuge of the oppressed and the moderator of lawless ambition," we are not asking it to set itself against the all-pervasive commercial instincts that prompt nine-tenths of our intercourse with the "backward civilisations," but are merely asking it to take its natural share in co-ordinating and guiding civilised enterprise. Had the Christian and humane professions with which the Congo Free State was launched upon its career, with the blessings of Europe upon it, been even approximately made good, we should in all human probability be able to point to the vast tract of Central Africa, at this moment, as a source of ever-growing wealth to the Western nations, and the seat of growing prosperity, rising ideals, and waning superstition and barbarism in itself. Such at least is the irresistible conclusion to which this remarkable book, written by a singularly competent, candid and large-minded observer, drives us step by step.

The great outstanding and luminous fact that remains upon the mind after reading Mr. Harris's book is that the "lazy nigger" who can understand nothing but the lash, and can understand that perfectly well and accept its discipline with respect verging upon affection, is at once the most stubborn of facts or the most groundless of myths. It all depends upon your pre-suppositions. If the black man is to work for the white man, in a semi-servile condition, accepted under some kind of direct or indirect compulsion, then the "lazy nigger" diagnosis roughly corresponds to the facts! But if the black man is working directly for himself, and only indirectly for the white man, in presence of the larger opportunities and more varied wants that association with him has stimulated, then the black man will develop an industry and a commercial sagacity and enterprise at least on a level with those of the average European stocks. Amongst other amusing stories that Mr. Harris tells in illustration of this is the following: A customer in Africa wanted an elephant tusk of a certain quality by a certain time. The European traders found it difficult to undertake the order. They made inquiries up the rivers and wherever they could reach the interior, but could not hear of what was wanted. But a native dealer cheerfully undertook the order, and punctually to the promised time supplied the tusk—he had ordered it from Europe! That man ought to lecture at the School of Economics on the division of labour, and the organised production and distribution of wealth! But the really impressive lesson in this matter is the contrast between the rapidly expanding cocoa industry on the British Gold Coast, where the negroes own the plantations, and its rapid and inevitable decay on the Portuguese islands, where it is run on what is now admitted to be a system of scarcely so much as disguised slavery.

So much for the "dawn," but what of the "darkness"? It is dark enough. The chief officials of the Congo are men bred in the evil Leopoldian tradition, and they are initiating the younger men into its spirit. When the last illusions disappear and Belgium realises that Leopold had eviscerated his domain before he handed it over to his country, how will she face the heavy and continuous drain upon her resources, even with a prospect of an ultimate return, required to put Congo industries on a sound business basis? Will she be wise and patient enough to reverse her whole theory and practice? Or will she fall before the specious plea that ruin has followed "reform," and seek to restore as completely as she dare the old régime? She has always retained the legal (or rather the illegal) basis on which it was reared in her claim to ownership of the land and to enforced labour.

And again, if Portugal is sincere in her desire to put an end to slavery in her colonies but is unable to enforce her will upon them, will she invoke, or accept under diplomatic pressure, the assistance of friendly allies in the task? Or must the dreary tragedy wear itself out in sordid failure? These and many other such questions force themselves upon the reader of "Dawn in Darkest Africa," but he will also find much instruction and entertainment in it which does not make too cruel demands upon his sympathetic imagination. Mr. Harris loves Africa and her peoples with a deep and tried affection. His buoyant optimism has not been quenched by all his years of suffering with the sufferers. The African forest is still to him less a place of horror than a place of hope, of romance, and of inexhaustible and ineffable beauty. No one need shrink from reading his book for fear of having his feelings harrowed, and his mind permanently haunted by horrors that he can do nothing to assuage; and everyone should read it who cares to understand the main outlines of the problem of West Africa, and of England's direct and indirect responsibilities and opportunities in relation to it.

A word in conclusion as to the Government officials. The Belgians, as we have seen, have a bad tradition and are working a bad system; but there is no reason to think that both might not be reformed under new conditions. The English official alone has any spirit of self-sacrifice or sincere desire to look after the interests of the native, but his sense of the colour-bar leads him practically to suppress all the higher hopes and ambitions of the subject races and goes far to sterilise his influence as an educator and civiliser; and his caste feeling degenerates into an intolerable snobbishness, and makes him ignore and neglect all opportunities of helping or obliging the commercial community. The German is thoroughly enlightened in his relations to all traders, whether of his own country or any other country. He is vigilant, courteous, resourceful, and thoroughly efficient. But he has no feeling whatever for the native, and may be relied on not to allow any "sentimental" considerations to interfere with the execution of any measures supposed to benefit the trading community. The Portuguese is a kindly lover of ease and beauty. Wherever he is there are flowers and gardens; and the colour-bar does not exist for him. But domestic and industrial slavery corrupt his administration.

A very able and sympathetic introduction by Lord Cromer will probably win access for Mr. Harris's book in many quarters to which it might not have won its way alone.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

MRS. MARKINSON'S HOLIDAY.

In contrast to the melancholy accounts of frustrated hopes and of summer tours spoiled by weather, Mrs. Markinson's wonderful holiday stands out brightly. She is never tired of telling the story. The queer thing about it was—if you can single out one point as queer amid such extraordinary happenings—that it was not called a holiday at all. Mrs. Markinson was asked if she would go and make shirts at a small exhibition of women's sweated home-work at Newcastle. When her outing was over, they gave her 12s. 6d. for her two days' work. She felt at first as if she could not for very shame take the money, but they said she must.

Mrs. Markinson had seen shirts made from her earliest childhood, for her mother used to do them, and she used to help sometimes. She hated shirt-making above everything else, and when she was a child she made up her mind that she would sooner be anything in the world than a shirt-maker. So when she left school she went into a cotton-mill, and got a trade into her fingers. But then she married, and after the first baby came, her husband would not let her go back to the mill and leave it for the neighbours to mind, so then she turned to shirt-making at home, like her mother before her. She made them at 8d. and 9d. a dozen. There was the hire of the machine to take off, and there was, of course, the cost of the cotton—sometimes the machine would seem fairly to eat the cotton, it was used up so fast.

It was a fine thing to go off in the train. It made a person feel a bit frightened, but you enjoyed it all the same. Mrs. Markinson and her friend were met at Newcastle and taken to a beautiful house.

The Exhibition, at which workers were paid such improbable rates, did not open till three o'clock, so the lady that they called the Secretary (and a real lady she was, and no mistake) said she would take them to see the sea. They all went by a sort of tram, and when they got near the sea before they could see it they smelled it, and Mrs. Markinson wondered if she were sea-sick. The Secretary-lady showed them all round the beach, and bought them cherries and fancy cakes, like the thorough lady she was; and then she took them into a cave. She told them to follow her, and not to look round till they got to a certain point. Then she told them to look back, and there, through the hole at the end, they saw the sea. At least they said it was the sea, but if they had not said so, Mrs. Markinson would have thought it was a big blue hill. All the time, whenever she looked at the sea, she could hardly believe that it was not a big blue hill stretching up before them. Then the Secretary-lady asked if they would like to go in a boat. It gave Mrs. Markinson a start to think of it, but the others said "Oh, come along," and she knew she would never have such a chance again, so she said she would go if she might sit between two of the other women on the seat. They got into a boat, and there she sat between the two, holding down her head over her knees, with her hands before her eyes, so that she should not see the sea. She was very much frightened, but she enjoyed going all the same. A few minutes after they started there was a great splash behind. She held her hands tighter than ever over her eyes, and she cried out "There's some poor soul gone down!" She thought of the Titanic, and she knew that she could not have borne to see the struggles of someone drowning, but she called to the others to look out and tell her. Then they all laughed and said it was all right, and they told her to look out for herself. At last she took away her hands from before her face, and what did she see but a man's feet, and then his head bobbing up; and it turned out that they were rowing past the gentlemen's bathing place, and it seemed this gentleman had jumped off the board, and was swimming and floating. There was a great laugh at her, and they did not forget it.

She had not been so very frightened at first, as you might say, but when they had been going on for a bit, the boat seemed to be going up and down a great deal more. There would be like a hole in the water near them, and a lot of water heaped up on the top, and she thought it wouldn't take much to make the boat turn over. Also the going up and down of the boat seemed to make everything go up and down, too. And then she thought that as they had gone so far she must be getting near the top of the blue hill of sea that they had seen from the beach, and that when they came right to the top the boat could do nothing but fall down on the other side, for there would be nothing to hold it up. She felt that she had been far enough, and that she could go no further, and she began to scream, and would not stop. They could not make her stop, so the Secretary-lady said they would go back, and so they did, but she screamed all the way. She felt sorry to have shortened the pleasure of the others, but she had gone as far as she could.

She had enjoyed the boat very much, although it had made her scream.

Everything at Newcastle had been beautiful. Everyone she saw seemed to be happy there. All the trouble seemed to be left at home, and at Newcastle people were all enjoying themselves. She had not had time even to worry about the children at home, until she went to bed. If ever she began to worry herself someone would say, "Come along, Mrs. Markinson!" or "Just look at this, Mrs. Markinson!" She had not had time to run up nearly as many shirts as she would have wished in the Exhibition, but when the people came round to the stalls they kept stopping her to ask questions. She felt ashamed that she had not done more. The holiday had been champion and had done her a lot of good. Even things at home had looked different since she got back. She had got into the way of thinking that there was not anything in the world—not for her—but now it seemed as if there might be something after all for her, too.

Mr. Markinson appeared less hopeful, but then he had not been away.

BARBAROUS FORMS OF PUNISHMENT.

SIR,—I have just read with pain and disappointment the article in to-day's (November 9) INQUIRER with regard to the White Slave Traffic Bill. You speak of "a deep and instinctive reverence for human nature inseparable from Christian civilisation" which should make a return to flogging abhorrent to us all. Is this "deep and instinctive reverence," &c., only to be thought of where the men and women engaged in the horrible traffic are concerned? What of our daughters who are carried off, most of them unconscious and ignorant, to a degradation compared with which flogging is a mere flea-bite? I do not know if Mr. Salt and Mr. C. Graham whom you quote have daughters of their own, but I feel sure that every true father and mother in England to-day has "a deep and instinctive reverence for human nature" in the first place where their own daughters are concerned. And these poor victims are all daughters of some father and mother.

You speak of the "true note of the Gospel." I find the true note of the Gospel in this case in Matt. xviii. 6-9, "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones, . . . it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." The tenderness of Jesus was shown to the woman who had sinned and degraded herself, and not to those who had been the cause of her degradation. On reading the report of the debate in the House last week, I am confident there are thousands of women who said, "Thank God, our men are at last rising to a sense of their responsibility in this matter." It is true that with the lowest class of criminal flogging may not have been a deterrent of crime, but the men we are now considering are men with a certain amount of education and bodily sensitiveness, to whom the physical pain would be a terror and the branding a lasting disgrace. I would even go further, and punish the men who create the demand, for without the demand there would be no supply.—Yours, &c.,

LILY M. TWEEDY.

Trillington Hall, Morpeth, Nov. 9, 1912.

SIR,—I wish to thank you for your timely protest against the adoption of the punishment of flogging, even for procurers. Its acceptance by the House is an instance of a psychic phenomenon which is only too common. The art of Jiu-jitsu depends on the skilful use of an opponent's strength and effort to his own overthrow, and in this art the Tempter of mankind is adept. He delights in tripping up moral indignation against one form of animalism so that it falls headlong into another. As the words "brutality" and "bestiality" reveal, cruelty and concupiscence are near akin; but since the second is never without some touch of the first, we must consider cruelty the master-vice. In order to cast out the lesser devil, the House of Commons has invoked the very Prince of devils. Such are the snares that beset an unbridled moral indignation!

Is there any chance of getting the clause thrown out in the House of Lords?—Yours, &c., E. W. LUMMIS.

Cambridge, November 13, 1912.

SIR,—May I thank you for your courage in your outspoken attack upon that type of panic-legislation, of which we have just had so grievous an example in the flogging amendment to the White Slave Traffic Bill? With almost the whole of your leading article everyone who gives serious thought to the matter must be in sincere agreement. There is, however, one point (your last) that seems scarcely as sound as those preceding. You speak of the unanimous feeling that the flogging of procurers shall not apply to women. Now, Sir, is there not a very grave danger that by this hurried piece of legislation against male criminals, all that will happen will be the use of women to do this horrible work, and not the ultimate reduction of the crime at all? I notice that the Manchester Guardian this morning mentions this point, so I am not alone in holding this view.

Again, do those who call so loudly for the flogging penalty understand what degradation they will inflict upon those who must administer the Act? It is easy for M.P.'s to show a hasty indignation with a crime, by passing into law a punishment which they will never be called upon to inflict. Out of sight only too often means out of imagination. We place enough degrading work upon our prison officials, as it is, in such affairs as forcible feeding of political offenders, without adding this new horror. Finally, Sir, just how much responsibility lies with the supporters of any Government in power which pays, and is allowed to pay, its women workers on Army trousers the despicable pittance of 2½d. per pair, and refuses to raise that rate when attention is drawn to the matter?

It is not, as you remark, the victims of this unhappy profession who are really so much to blame, as all of us who support, in Parliament or out of it, any Government that creates conditions in which it is indeed hard for its women workers to live a decent and self-respecting life.—Yours, &c.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

APPEAL FOR ANNUAL COLLECTIONS.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to the fact that Sunday next, the 17th instant, is the day on which the annual collections of our chapels take place on behalf of the funds of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Nearly 250 congregations took collections last year, and over £600 was received from them.

I trust this year this amount will be exceeded, and I can assure any friend aiding us that his gift will go direct to missionary work, as our office expenses are covered by our income from investments.

If any friend is unable to attend one of the services, I shall be happy to receive and acknowledge his donation, if sent to me at Essex Hall, Essex-street.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

SIDELIGHTS ON MR. BALFOUR.

Mr. Balfour as Philosopher and Thinker. A Collection of More Important Passages in his New Political Writings, Speeches, and Addresses, Selected by Wilfrid Short. London: Longmans & Co.

THIS is a book sui generis. It is not a mere collection of elegant extracts from a great writer which aims at giving us the pith and substance of his teaching without the trouble of going through all his writings for ourselves. Nor, on the other hand, is it a complete edition of Mr. Balfour's works. The man who wants to study the Foundations of Belief will not be satisfied to read only what is given in this volume.

The aim of this book, as we understand it, is to throw light on the extremely complex and interesting character of Mr. Balfour himself. If he were nothing but a thinker and a literary critic we should be inclined to condemn this book altogether.

We should say, on the one hand, that a number of the short speeches on golf and hunting, and medicine and music, and novels and cycling and matrimony, are not worth publication, and, on the other hand, that important books like "A Defence of Philosophic Doubt" and "The Foundations of Belief," cannot be rightly understood or appreciated in the extracts which are presented to us here. We should say, let us have all of those, and nothing of the rest.

The justification of this book of snippets, so far as it can be justified, is that Mr. Balfour is known mainly to the world as a brilliant statesman. He has led a great party in the State, he has been Prime Minister, he has set his mark upon the legislation of his country. His life has been largely filled by public affairs. He is known and admired as one of the most ingenious of debaters, as a master of Parliamentary fence, as a courteous, honourable opponent, and as a most loyal and noble-hearted friend. Mr. Balfour has always been an essentially party man in his political life, but at the same time there has always been a curious element of detachment in him. He has never quite satisfied the party man, because even in the midst of his most brilliant attacks on the enemy—purely party in spirit and in method—there was just a suspicion in the minds of his followers that he thought the whole business very wearisome and rather absurd. He can play the party game as well as any, and better than most, but there is a little cherub in Mr. Balfour which sits up aloft and laughs at it all. The real party man, intent on fighting and caring for nothing else, occasionally sees that cherub grin, and he feels uncomfortable. He prefers a leader like Mr. Bonar Law, who, while far less attractive as a personality, and far less ingenious and brilliant, and effective as a debater, is saturated with the party ideal, and does not think or care for anything else.

The detachment of Mr. Balfour is very different from that of Mr. Gladstone, with his enthusiasm for Homer and Anglicanism and a hundred other things. Those interests were merely an opportunity for rest and change to an ardent, glowing mind intensely eager to see and understand everything. Mr. Gladstone's studies never made him think any less of politics. He came back to politics like a giant refreshed. He believed profoundly in politics, not from the point of view of party, but on their ideal side.

Mr. Balfour's detachment, on the other hand, is not the mere power to throw aside the worries of the State for a time and forget them in golf or reading or philosophic doubt. He comes back, as we conceive of him, not like a war horse delighting in the fray, but groaning in spirit, wondering why in the world he is foolish enough to go on. He conceals his feelings admirably; he pulverises his opponents, he plays the game with consummate skill, but nevertheless he cannot quite hide the fact that he is not with all his soul and mind a believer in the strife.

In saying all this we are not in the least censuring Mr. Balfour. It is a good thing to have in the House of Commons some men who would rather be somewhere else, and who, while loyal to their party, can see things with a certain humorous detachment. We should not place them so high as the few men who have a strong faith in Parliamentary institutions and a high ideal of the work which it is possible to do. But, on the other hand, Mr. Balfour is far above the great mass of merely party men. Without attacking party, while indeed participating actively in party work, his spirit and temperament and underlying beliefs are a corrective of the one-eyed limitations of the party man. He makes for culture and breadth of view and toleration even in the midst of his cleverest advocacy.

It is on the lines that we have sketched that the book before us may be justified. Mr. Balfour, as a statesman, is one of the most interesting, complex, and subtle personalities of modern times. Just because he plays the game so well, and dislikes it so much, we cannot possibly know him adequately through his political speeches. We therefore welcome the opportunity of seeing him, as it were, in undress uniform, on non-political occasions. Some of the speeches and papers here given are slight in texture, but they are all characteristic of a man who, without any strong passions, or any very confident faith, has a genial, kindly, and philosophic outlook upon life.

Mr. Balfour is essentially a philosopher; not, indeed, a great creative philosopher, but a thinker who gets below current conceptions, and who likes to see everything, even "golf" or "fashion," from a fresh, original point of view. His philosophy does not end in universal doubt, as is sometimes said. Neither, indeed, does it end like the best philosophy, with deep convictions, leading on to the "O Altitude" of St. Paul. But it makes for a large sympathy, a certain noble patience with men's follies, a reverence for the past, and a belief in a divine thought working through the ages for the redemption of mankind.

UNHISTORICAL CRITICISM.

Ecce Deus. By W. B. Smith. London: Watts & Co. 6s. net.

WE learn from Mr. Smith, Professor of Mathematics of Tulane University, that the Gospels, from first to last, and the earliest more distinctly than the latest, are not historical in any sense, but symbolic pictures drawn by the devotees of a Jesus cult. The conception of a God-man, which orthodoxy finds in the New Testament, is rejected as a contradiction in terms, and it is against the humanitarian doctrine of the person of Christ that Mr. Smith directs his most scathing attacks. We take it as a tribute to Unitarianism that it should have drawn the fire of so accomplished a representative of the rationalist Press. The courage and consistency of our author are beyond praise. The second Gospel, once the stronghold of a Liberal interpretation of the life of Jesus, is now undermined by a subtle train of reasoning, and the work shown to be essentially symbolic from beginning to end. Schmiedel's "pillars," characterised as the bulwarks of Liberalism, are shattered by the same explosive. This is how one such pillar falls. "Why callest thou me good? None is good, save God only." "Schmiedel reasons that a Jesus-worshipper could not have invented this disclaimer of goodness, hence he concludes that the report is absolutely trustworthy, that Jesus must have used these words, hence must have been a historic man." "In this form," we are told, "the argument crumbles instantly, for this famous incident is an elaborate symbolism, the Rich One being none other than the People of Israel, whom Jesus (the new Jehovah) 'loved,' according to the prophet, 'when Israel was young I loved him'" (Hos. ii. 1). After this, we are not surprised to hear of "the probability that the original form of the saying was 'One is the Good'—a catch-word of Greek ethical philosophy, correctly translated into Aramaic, then incorrectly translated back into Greek." Hitherto, it appears, scholars have all laboured under a delusion, and the movement of thought in the Gospels has been in the contrary direction to that which they had supposed. "As we go back to older and older representations, we find the human elements in the Jesus-bild fading visibly away, the divine coming more and more conspicuously to the front, until, in proto-Mark, we behold the manifest God." Presumably it is due to an oversight that "Ecce Deus" does not give parallels drawn from other religious movements. It would have been interesting to see how Gautama was first worshipped by his disciples as deity, and then gradually lost their reverence until today he is "nothing more than a mild-mannered rabbi or a benevolent dervish." If a plain man should object that the central figure of the Gospel story seems, for the most part, to talk and act like a member of the human race, Prof. Smith assures him that this is a fundamental error. The New Testament is a collection of esoteric writings, and one requires to borrow the mathematician's symbolic key to enter into their meaning. Then he may understand, perhaps with some astonishment, that the man with the withered hand is Jewish Humanity, the little children who came to Jesus are Jewish proselytes, Mary and Martha are secret names for the Gentile and the Jewish world, and, may be, "Paul is hinted at in the little child set in the midst of the disciples." As for the sayings of Jesus, they have been assembled from every point of the literary compass. Anything which remotely resembles what Jesus is reported to have said, and many things which do not, must now be reckoned the originals of words put into the mouth of a fictitious teacher by the worshippers of a Christian Jehovah. Moreover, "we may confidently maintain that, if we possessed the Greek ethic in its original form and entirety, we should find anticipated practically the whole ethics of the New Testament."

In view of Prof. Smith's startling discoveries, it is quite possible that he may yet recover what he requires from the Gnostics of the second century, for it is they who inspired the evangelists and Apostles. Again, the exposition of monotheism by the early Christian Apologists in their discussions with Polytheists, almost to the exclusion of emphasis upon the historic existence of Jesus, is a sure sign that they had not heard of the man of Nazareth, and, unfortunately, when they do mention him, as Prof. Smith shows, they mean little or nothing by it. The allusions sometimes seen in pagan writers to Jesus are easily disposed of. "The chapter in Tacitus lies under the very gravest suspicions." "The sentences in Suetonius may be genuine, but they attest nothing strictly relevant. Like may be said of the Pliny-Trajan correspondence." Towards the close of the book, Prof. Smith turns philologist, and discusses words like Iscariot and Nazareth. In the Hibbert Journal he had announced that Judas stands for the Jewish people, and that the delivering up of Jesus to the Jews means the surrendering of the great idea of the Jesus cult by the Jews to the heathen. Here there is more material of the same kind, and equally valuable. Truly, if symbolism is another word for rationalism, and "Ecce Deus" represents its last and most serious attack upon Liberal Christianity, then it is matter for rejoicing, since Liberal Christianity does not seem destined to fall to the trumpet tones of William Benjamin Smith.

HELLENISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Hellenism and Christianity. By Gerald Friedländer. London: P. Valentine & Sons.

THE author of this book adds, in a post-script, an explanation of its purpose which might with advantage have been given in the preface. He had, he says, two objects in view, (1) to popularise the study of Comparative Religion, and (2) to enable the reader to learn the truth as to the connection between Christianity and Judaism on the one hand, and the Hellenistic Oriental religions on the other. The second of these objects would have been quite sufficient to engage the undivided attention of the writer, as also of the reader.

Mr. Friedländer is mainly concerned to find parallels, in Hellenistic sources, for the leading concepts of the Pauline and Johannine theology, and he has certainly collected a good deal of very interesting matter. Whether there really was so much borrowing from sources, Hellenistic or otherwise, on the part of men like Paul and John, is a point on which some doubt is surely reasonable. Wherever Paul may have found the form for his ideas, the substance of them was his own; or else he was not the profound spiritual genius which he is usually supposed to have been.

One thing, however, Mr. Friedländer does show, which Christian scholars very much need to learn, viz., that what is characteristic in Paul's theology was not derived from Rabbinical Judaism. If Paul can be explained at all, by reference to any other source than his own religious nature, the explanation will not be found in anything that he learned from Gamaliel. It was from Paul, and not from Jesus, that the Rabbis took alarm at what they considered to be danger to pure monotheism. And, considering what has come of Pauline theology, the Rabbis were not without warrant for their apprehensions.

Mr. Friedländer has no difficulty in showing that such ideas as those of a dying Saviour-God, of a God-man born of a virgin, of a Son of God who rises from the dead, do not belong to Rabbinism; and that if they can claim any Jewish support at all, it is only in the Judaism of the Dispersion. In other words, their real source is outside Judaism of any type.

As regards the relation between Hellenism and Christianity, which is the main subject of the book, the impression made upon the present writer is that the conclusions drawn will need a good deal of further evidence before they can be regarded as established. The parallels of phrase and fact are certainly striking; but one would like to know more of the context in which the phrases occur, and of the general substratum of religious thought and life from which the facts arose. Mr. Friedländer has read the works of Frazer, Pfeiderer, Deissmann, Cumont, Gunkel, Jeremias, and Brückner, by whose help, as he admits, it was alone possible for his book to be written. Whether he has been sufficiently cautious in following those brilliant pioneers of comparative religion time will show. Meanwhile, he has given the Christian reader a good deal to think about.

A STUDY IN ETHNOLOGY.

Malta and the Mediterranean Race. By R. N. Bradley. With a Map and 54 Illustrations. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.

THE African origin of the Mediterranean Race is a theory that is by no means accepted with unanimity in this country, but the suggestive work of Sergi and Mosso has greatly stimulated the efforts of the Italian school to solve the whole question by evidence of skulls as against the testimony of language. The author of the present work, a most readable book of unusual and absorbing interest, is a whole-hearted adherent of Sergi's theories and methods, and he has also availed himself of linguistic similarities to make out a very good case. His well-reasoned arguments are certainly calculated to carry conviction, but it is at the same time necessary not to overlook the other side of the case, which lays great stress upon the strong influence of environment in altering racial characteristics, and in particular asserts that roundness of skulls (brachycephaly) is simply due to physical surroundings, just as the horses of the Pampas, when brought up in the mountainous regions of Chile and Peru, rapidly change their physical type. On the other hand, the fact that brachycephaly is of comparatively recent origin (geologically speaking) is a point greatly in favour of Sergi's theory, for every known example of Glacial and early post-Glacial man is of the long-headed type. Indeed, a round-headed race is not known to occur in Western Europe until the latter part of the Palæolithic period, whilst Russia, as far back as history and tradition can take us, has been the home of the greatest and most homogeneous mass of brachycephalic humanity. In short, brachycephaly is essentially of Slavonic origin. The long-heads, however, have continually re-asserted themselves, and still remain characteristic of the Mediterranean region in spite of repeated invasions of Huns, Vandals, or other round-heads from the Russian area. This persistence of the long-headed character in the Mediterranean countries, and its power of absorbing or eliminating alien traits, may probably be suitably interpreted in the light of Mendelism by long-headedness being the "recessive" and round-headedness the "dominant" character in the fusion of the two races.

Although the author has carried out valuable and important excavations on prehistoric sites in the Maltese Islands, his book is not a mere chronicle of his work, but it gives a general description of the remarkable neolithic monuments and underground sanctuaries, as well as of the antiquities that have been unearthed. In the author's own words, his chief intention is "to portray the psychological characteristics of the pre-Aryans in Europe, with a view to offer at least a partial solution to the problems how a people, so advanced as the Cretan discoveries show them to have been, came to fall into insignificance at the onslaught of the less cultured Aryans." He endeavours, also, to compare the characters of the two races and to indicate the physical reason for the difference. One of the most interesting portions of his work, and certainly the one on which there will be the most difference of opinion, is his attempt to establish the existence of a substratum of pre-Aryan speech in Europe in spite of the prevalence of the Aryan language, and to indicate traces not only of Hamitic but also of Semitic speech in the language of our own islands, extending the claims raised by Professor Morris Jones in establishing many remarkable similarities and relationships between the syntax of Welsh and that of the Hamitic language of early Egypt.

The migrations of the ancient Mediterranean race are usually assumed to be indicated by the presence of dolmens in North Africa and Western Europe. The author notes, but does not solve, the puzzling problem why dolmens should be absent from Egypt whilst occurring in abundance in Tripoli on the one hand and in Syria on the other. It is, however, even more surprising, although the author does not extend his survey so far East, to find a great series of dolmens, stone circles and Ristvaens in India, covering the hills and plateaux of the Deccan and the region to the south, but these stone monuments appear to belong not to the Bronze Age, but to the Iron Age. If the dolmens of India were built by an offshoot of the Mediterranean race, it is certainly remarkable to find none of these characteristic structures in the intervening countries between India and Syria, although there are traces of settlements of the long-headed Dravidians along the Makran coast of the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Bradley maintains that the evidence of skulls goes to show that the Maltese are a comparatively pure race, and not, as is too often supposed, a medley of various nations speaking a composite jargon. Malta shares with many other islands the general immunity from racial change, and in the earliest days it lay off the main trade routes. Probably in the course of history it became at most a minor trading-station, or, as at the present time, a military station, whether under Roman, Arab, Norman or English rule. The author also explains that although the Maltese are a Hamitic race, their early adoption of a Semitic language arises from the advantages of Semitic over Hamitic in its "logical and easy inflexions and simple verb-forms." Such a change can take place quite peaceably, as in Central Africa at the present day, where many of the natives in Eastern Uganda are adopting of their own free will the simple language of the adjacent Kavirondo tribes.

THE CLASSICAL PSYCHOLOGISTS. Selections illustrating Psychology from Anaxagoras to Wundt. Compiled by Benjamin Rand, Ph.D., Harvard University. London: Constable & Co. 10s. 6d. net.

A WORK of great value to the student of psychology, more especially of psychology from the historical point of view, has been produced by Dr. Rand in his "Classical Psychologists." By means of extracts from the chief works of the great writers on psychology, Dr. Rand has essayed to give us a history of the subject from the earliest times. As in the case of his companion volume on the "Classical Moralists," published two or three years ago, the extracts are long enough to admit of the reader gathering from them a clear idea of the author's point of view, and thanks to the judicious nature of the selection learning at the same time what is chiefly characteristic of the writer as a landmark in the progress of thought. Thus, to mention only modern names, James Mill is represented by a passage on the Association of Ideas, Fechner by his criticism and development of Weber's Law, Lotze by his theory of "local signs," James by his revolutionary view of Emotion and his brilliant analysis and description of the stream of consciousness. As is natural and desirable, by far the major portion of the book is devoted to modern writers, beginning with Thomas Hobbes. Some hundred pages are given over to ancient theories as presented by Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, Lucretius, and Plotinus. The patristic and mediæval period is represented by characteristic passages from Tertullian, Gregory of Nyssa, Saint Augustine, and Thomas Aquinas. Of living writers we find passages from Hering, Mach, Stumpf, and Wundt only. To every student of psychology other names will occur which he would like to have seen represented. In his introduction Dr. Rand says: "The study of psychology as pursued to-day in several important divisions might suggest the desirability of a work of recent material from these various domains." We hope very much that Dr. Rand will carry into execution the plan here mooted. In such a volume the work of Ward, Stout, Titchener, Baldwin, Münsterberg, Freud, and others would find the place it deserves.

THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY: HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, MALACHI, AND JONAH. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 12s. net.

To review adequately a book of this kind is always difficult, because its excellence depends on the accuracy of an enormous mass of details, to say nothing of the methodical arrangement of them and the clear presentation of the critical conclusions founded upon them. The International Critical Commentary has made its reputation for sound scholarship, and a generous provision of all that the advanced student requires, and the present volume seems fully to come up to the standard of its predecessors. The three scholars, whose work is included in it, are all Americans; but the peculiarities of the American language are happily less conspicuous in this volume than in some others that have appeared. Where severe compression is necessary in order to find room for all that has to be said, it is vain to expect anything like fine writing. These commentaries are marked by a strict attention to business; the business, moreover, of the critical scholar rather than that of the preacher or of the general reader. These can find what they want elsewhere, e.g., in such a series as that of Woods and Powell, on the Hebrew Prophets. But, for the scholar who can read his Hebrew Bible and Septuagint, the International Critical Commentary is well-nigh indispensable. By its help he can learn the present position of all the critical questions raised by the several books of the Old Testament; and its ample bibliography directs him to the sources of fuller information. In the present volume, where all appears good, so far as the present writer has been able to check it, perhaps the best is the commentary on the book of Jonah. How many readers of the Old Testament have ever realised the beauty and the lofty spirit of that book, and have not been content to throw it aside because of the incident of the whale? Very few, it is to be feared. The author of this commentary does only justice to the book when he says of it: "The Old Testament reaches here one of its highest points; for the doctrine of God receives in it one of its clearest and most beautiful expressions, and the spirit of prophetic religion is revealed at its truest and best." That is well said, and it shows that the work of exposition is in the right hands. May it meet with the approbation which it deserves.

THE CHURCH AND NONCONFORMITY. By the Venerable J. H. Greig. London: Edward Arnold. 3s. 6d. net.

ARCHDEACON GREIG has expanded a paper read before the Worcester Diocesan Conference, and produced a book which is a real contribution to the vexed question of the relations between Episcopalians and Nonconformists. The statement of the evils of the present situation, and the plea for a frank consideration of the differences which divide professing Christians in this country are alike admirable. The Archdeacon makes the most of concessions by Dissenters to Episcopal forms and principles in their changed attitude towards Liturgical services, Church music, and architecture, and their more exalted view of the office of the ministry. At the same time, he marks the decline of strict Sabbatarianism amongst Nonconformists, and their almost general abandonment of the theory of verbal inspiration, and of the doctrines of Calvinism. These things are interpreted as signs that promise well for the movement towards reunion, which, it is thought, might commence with a general acknowledgment of belief in the doctrine of the Godhead and incarnation of Jesus Christ. Perhaps a more complete analysis of English religious thought to-day might reveal less doctrinal unanimity than is here assumed. It is not sufficient to fall back, as Archdeacon Greig does, upon the Prayer Book and the Free Church Catechism. There are many Anglicans who interpret the former in their own fashion, which is not that of our author, whilst the latter, as is well known, has no binding authority amongst Nonconformists. So far as it goes, however, "The Church and Nonconformity" does make plain the gradual approach towards a common ground in regard to worship, Biblical scholarship, and the like, on the part of both these great religious parties. And it is just here where they will meet Liberal Christians, whose freedom from doctrinal tests has enabled them to occupy, even from an early date, these same positions.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

MUSIC AND STRENGTH.

So lovely was the voice of the girl, as she sang on the stage of the theatre of Messina, that the people made the place ring with their applause. She was eighteen years old. Her name was Albani, and she was a daughter of Canada. This was the first time the girl had sung in an opera before the public.

The curtain had been lowered, and the Sicilian folk were leaving the theatre, talking of Albani's songs; but the singer was still chatting with friends on the stage.

A group of persons approached her, leading an aged Sicilian, nearly ninety years old. Bent was his frame, and his eyes had a strange, blank look. All the citizens of Messina loved him. In past days, when the patriots of Sicily suffered for claiming freedom for the people, this man had been arrested and flung into jail. His offence was speaking and rebelling for the liberties of Sicily. In prison he lost his sight for ever.

He had visited the theatre that night, and he longed to be presented to the singer whose voice had touched his heart—his old patriot heart. You may be sure Miss Albani was ever so ready to take his hand, and say how glad she was to see him.

Whenever, after that, she came to Messina to sing, the old man would bring to her, in a silk kerchief, some Paradise oranges as a gift of Old Age to Music. And once, he begged that he might pass his trembling hands over her young face that he might have an idea of what she was like.

Music was joyful at being able to charm Old Age.

In the year 1897, in a room at Westminster, a meeting of statesmen from the Over-sea Dominions and Colonies was held. These gentlemen had come long distances to confer with Mr. Joseph Chamberlain on the affairs of the British Empire.

One of the Premiers was Richard Seddon. He had been a Lancashire lad; his birthplace was near St. Helen's. His family had emigrated to the Long White Cloud, that is to say, New Zealand. Richard was an active and persevering fellow. He became at length a Member of the Parliament. In 1893 he rose to the rank of Prime Minister, and remained in that office till his death in 1906. At one time he had worked, as Premier, with the famous Governor Grey—I mean Sir George Grey. Much service for the Empire had Grey done. He had been Governor of South Australia, Governor of Cape Colony, Governor of New Zealand twice. Wherever he was Grey did his work well, whether he had dealings with South African natives, or Australian farmers, or the brown-skinned Maori people of the Long White Cloud.

Well, to come back to Mr. Seddon (he was afterwards Sir Richard). When he arrived in London for the conference with Mr. Chamberlain, he went to stay at the Hotel Cecil, a big place in the Strand, very handy for Westminster. He had only been at the hotel a few hours when a lady was announced.

She told Mr. Seddon she was secretary to Sir George Grey, his old chief in New Zealand. Sir George was now living in London. He had retired from the labours of public affairs. But his thoughts still travelled to and fro on the earth—to Africa, to Australia—ah! and to New Zealand. He hoped to call presently, and look once again on the face of his friend Seddon.

Presently, Sir George entered, leaning on the arm of a young New Zealander, Mr. W. Pember Reeves. A smile of friendship lit his face, and he held out his withered and thin hand to the comrade of long-past Parliament days and public tasks. They helped him to an arm-chair, and Seddon and Grey talked a long while of their work in the Long White Cloud, of the British Empire, of the high duties of the English in England and the children of England over-seas.

It was time to go. At that period, I suppose, there was no lift at the Hotel Cecil. At any rate, Seddon said:—

“Sir George, let me carry you downstairs. It will be easier for you than walking.”

Laughter
But Seddon meant it. He took the old Governor in his arms, and New Zealand bore England down the stairway to the hall. Strength carried Age.

At the entrance of the Hotel, the good-byes were said, and a carriage took Grey through the turmoil of the Strand to his quiet home.

Just before Richard Seddon sailed from England to New Zealand, a telegram came from Sir George Grey:—

“God take you in his keeping.”

As I tell you this tale of Seddon, I think of some Latin lines, which I will here set down. You will not see anything very pretty in them:—

*Hæc fatus, latos humeros subjectaque
colla
Veste super fulvique insternor pelle leonis;
Succedoque oneri.*

But in those foreign words is hid a beautiful story of the siege of Troy City. The city was on fire, and crackling flames leaped from house-tops. Greek soldiers, with burnished shields and glittering helmets of brass, darted like wolves and tigers after the flying Trojans. The hero Æneas had run to his father's house:

“Father, come with me! Troy is in ruins.”

“My son, let me die. I am but a palsied old man; and my city is doomed.”

Long they argued. At length, the father gave way. He was willing to go with Æneas to the place of refuge in the mountains.

But how? Æneas had his son Iulus to lead by the hand: he had his wife Creusa to protect; and the old man could not walk.

“My lads,” cried the hero to his servants, “follow me close. We go to the temple on the mount. And, father, I want you to carry the holy images of the household: for we will take them with us, whether we fare near or far.”

Then, says Æneas in his tale (told in the Latin words just written):—

“When I had said this, I spread a coat and the brown skin of a lion on my broad back and my bent neck, and I leaned down to take the burden of my father.”

And through the smoke and the wreck Æneas bore his sire to safety.

Strength helped Age.

How beautiful is Music! How glorious is Strength! F. J. GOULD.

THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

LAST Thursday was the 80th birthday of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, who was born at Letterkenney, Co. Donegal, on November 14, 1832. His numerous friends have availed themselves of the welcome opportunity of expressing to him their feeling of affection and admiration and their sense of deep personal gratitude for the abiding influence of his life and thought in Religion, Literature, and Art. We give below the text of the address. There is no doubt that numerous other friends would have liked to sign it, but this has been impossible in view of the semi-privacy and the spontaneous simplicity with which the tribute has been arranged.

TO THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE,
M.A., D.LITT.

DEAR MR. BROOKE,—We desire to express to you on your eightieth birthday our feelings of respect and affection, and to thank you for the work that you have done and the influence you have exerted through a long and noble life.

We recognise your eminence as a preacher and the sincerity and courage with which you have always acted and spoken. Your message has been inspired by love and by a longing for the good and the beautiful. You have appealed to the deepest needs of men and women; you have helped them to realise the things that belong unto their peace. We have felt in your teaching a great delight in beauty and a great confidence in the goodness of life and the greatness of death. Your writings have made for a high joy in living. You have condemned evil only to reveal the good. You have always tried to speak the truth in love. You have touched life at many points. We feel in you a wide, and sympathetic humanity and a noble imagination which has helped you to understand and interpret many various types of men and to find good in many different forms of activity.

We thank you for what you have done as an interpreter of Art and Poetry. In your teaching we have seen that the love of beauty and the love of truth and right are essentially one. It has helped the lover of beauty to love the right, and the lover of right to love the beautiful. You have shown the inner unity which binds the seekers after beauty, truth, and right together.

Above all, we reverence your life and the power of sympathy and friendship you possess. You have lived a long life of devotion to high ideals, always brave and cheerful in times of trial, always meeting your friends with encouragement and your troubles with a smile.

It is with sincere affection that we think of you and now offer you our heartfelt congratulations on the occasion of your eightieth birthday. We should like you to realise how much you are loved and honoured by your known and unknown friends, and we hope it may be a source of happiness for you to remember the respect and gratitude which your life and work have called out towards you in many hearts.

MR. EDWARD CARPENTER ON "THE INNER SELF."

THE announcement that Mr. Edward Carpenter was to give a lecture on "The Inner Self" drew a large audience to the Institute connected with the King's Weigh House on Thursday, November 7, and it was found necessary to adjourn to the church. The Rev. E. W. Lewis, who introduced the lecturer in a delightful little speech, frankly and gratefully declared that he was one of his disciples, and that he could not name any book which had influenced him more than "Towards Democracy." Mr. Carpenter plunged at once into his subject by separating the different selves of which we are aware even in our ordinary lives, and described how the corporeal and local self is gradually extended to the larger self which takes thought for others, and not only for its own gratification, as in the activity of the mother on behalf of her children, the wider interests called forth in working for a church or society, and in the still greater response to the call of national affairs or the spread of a religious movement, as in the case of patriots and martyrs. We had to realise what a vast thing this greater self is, how deep it goes, and how far it extends. It was one of the blessings of great experiences, in times of religious illumination, love, battle, and so on, even though they might be tragic and distressing, that they threw men back into that deeper self, if only once in a lifetime. It was this which lay behind the bundle of qualities which we call ourselves—something more ethereal and subtle, which contemplated those qualities and passed judgment upon them.

The great religious teachers of Northern India, whose sayings had been gathered together by their disciples in the Upanishads, had an insight into these things, the lecturer continued, which very few have to-day, and they were practically at one in saying that the self in each man is continuous with, almost identical with the self of the universe and of every living thing. The Bhagavad Gita speaks of him "whose soul is purified, whose self is the self of all creatures." Most people were not purified in this sense; we were always grasping, seeking to possess, judging and blaming others, and so putting veils between them and ourselves. But when the great experience came, the flash of insight into the heart of things, all that once seemed so important was swept away, and the soul saw with astonishment that it was in deep union with other souls, that it was indeed part of the great Soul. "He is the one God hidden in all creatures, all-pervading, the Self within all, watching over all works, shadowing all creatures, the witness, the perceiver, the only One free from qualities."

People bothered too much about their qualities, good and bad. Sometimes—especially in the case of the good people—those qualities really clouded and separated them from others. The thing to realise was that both the bad and good qualities of others were our own also, and then no way would be barred when we wanted to get into touch with our fellow creatures and understand them, however bad they might be. The consciousness of one universal life put an end to all separation, but men were only brought to it by continual experience. The ego goes through many phases, and is tormented by the sense of division and alienation until it realises its identity with the great forces of the universe, when happiness becomes a possibility, and the way of truth is open in every direction.

Mr. Carpenter, in conclusion, showed the close application of this philosophy of the inner self to our social problems, and to the whole conception of democracy. The foundations of society were false, the administration of justice was a mockery, the competition of the market-place a negation of right dealing just because of our failure to recognise the identity of each individual with all. The great fact of life was the eternal unity of life, and all sin meant separation and the denial of this fact. But the Kingdom of Heaven is within us all the time, and gradually it is coming to the surface—the kingdom of union and love and the common life which if we seek it first all things will be added unto us.

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC. UNITED DEMONSTRATION OF MEN AND WOMEN.

THE meeting which was held in the London Opera House on Tuesday, November 12, to urge the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill in an effective form this session, was an impressive one by reason of the vast number present and the enthusiasm with which the audience responded to the appeal for immediate action and unsleeping vigilance in regard to the most terrible social evil of our time. Long before 8 o'clock such a large crowd had gathered in Kingsway that arrangements were made for an overflow meeting, at which it was announced later there were 1,000 people present. Many well-known faces were recognised on the platform, and the boxes were occupied by representatives of the various societies, religious, social and political, which had united in this great demonstration, for once sinking all party interests or denominational distinctions in order to give support and strength to the Government for the passing of the Bill. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who was in the chair, said that they were all united in a cause that was simple and sacred. The facts were wholly beyond dispute, and it was not a matter in which any difference of opinion was possible among capable men and women who had given any consideration to the matter. They dared not have it on their consciences that they had left one stone unturned which could help once and for all to put an end to a hideous state of things. In speaking of the question of punishment the Archbishop seemed to have the sympathy of the entire audience when he advocated the use of the lash, but there was some applause later in the evening when Lady Barlow declared that she was not in favour of corporal punishment. Flogging was practically advocated by most of the speakers. The ovation of the evening was given to Lady Barlow when she said that what was more urgently needed than anything else in regard to the social evil was "an enfranchised and enlightened womanhood." The audience responded with prolonged applause. Mrs. General Booth spoke eloquently, and with all the weight of her exceptional experiences among the degraded and destitute, and Dr. Mary Murdoch, in dealing with the question from the medical point of view, unflinchingly laid before her hearers some of the appalling facts which had come to her knowledge in the course of her profession, and of which the world knows very little. Mr. Claude Montefiore gave an interesting account of the work of the Jewish Association for the Protection of Women and Girls, and Mrs. Nott-Bower explained the origin and motives of the Pass the Bill Committee, and pleaded for funds to carry on the work of enforcing the act when the Bill becomes law. The following resolution was moved in an earnest speech by the Bishop of Birmingham:—

This meeting of men and women, while profoundly regretting the limitation in Clause III. of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, of the liability of "the person in charge" to persons in charge of brothels, as likely to diminish the utility of the law and to facilitate the White Slave Traffic, records its thankfulness for the restitution of Clause I. to its original form, urges that Clause VI. shall be passed without weakening amendments, and trusts that the Bill will, without fail, be placed upon the Statute Book this session.

And this meeting emphatically assures Parliament that public opinion will require further and more effective legislation in the near future.

This was seconded by Mrs. F. D. Acland, the wife of the Under Secretary for War, who represented the Women's Liberal Federation, and passed unanimously. Mr. Edward Smallwood, L.C.C., Mr. D. L. Alexander, and the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett also spoke, the former laying special emphasis on the great necessity for strict personal morality on the part of the individuals who constitute society, and the abolition of the "double standard" which has received further condemnation this week in the pages of the Report of the Royal Commission on Divorce.

LORD MAYOR'S SUNDAY IN BIRMINGHAM.

THE Nonconformists have played no small part in the history of Birmingham. The members of the Unitarian churches in the city have always regarded the performance of public work as one of the chief duties of a citizen; and since the incorporation of the town in 1838, the office of Chief Magistrate has been filled on no less than thirty-three occasions by Unitarians.

The City Council, on Saturday, November 9, elected Mr. Ernest Martineau as Lord Mayor. Following the usual custom and accompanied by the members of the Council and magistrates, he was present on Sunday morning at the service in the Parish Church of St. Martin's, and attended the evening service at the Old Meeting Church.

The family of Martineau have long been associated with the public life of Birmingham, and have been members of the Old Meeting Church for generations. Sir Thomas Martineau, the father of the present Lord Mayor, was mayor for three years from 1884 to 1886, and his grandfather occupied a similar position in 1846.

The service at the Old Meeting Church, the home of the oldest Nonconformist congregation in the city, was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who recently began his duties as minister of the congregation. The sermon appears in full in our present issue. The Lord Mayor and the other members of the Corporation were met at the door by the minister and choir, and walked in procession up the church. There was a crowded congregation.

SOUTHERN ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

REPORT FOR 1911-12.

THE business of the Advisory Committee naturally fluctuates considerably from year to year, and while last year was an unusually busy one, this one has been singularly quiet. Only one meeting has been necessary.

The Revs. Henry Chelley and T. F. M. Brockway, both of them formerly Congregationalist ministers, have received the certificate of Recognition. The former has become minister at Pendleton, and the latter at Woolwich.

The Rev. Edward Ernest Coleman, M.A., formerly a Baptist minister, and lately Tutor of the Pioneer Preachers organised by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, has also received the certificate of Recognition.

The Rev. Fred Woolley, who for the last four years has been in charge as Lay Worker of the Belfast Domestic Mission, has now received a certificate of Recognition as a minister.

The Rev. Frank Coleman, who has been a lay worker at Wareham for the last three years, having satisfied the Examiners in the appointed course of Reading, has now received a certificate of Recognition as minister.

Of two probationers who were recognised as lay workers, on condition of their taking the prescribed course of Reading, your Committee has to report that one has decided not to proceed to examination, and the other, through ill-health, has so far been prevented from doing so.

It has been found necessary that the several Advisory Committees should be in touch with each other's proceedings with regard both to the ministers whom they consider suitable and to those whom they consider unsuitable for Recognition, and accordingly correspondence is carried on as occasion requires.

The Treasurer's accounts show in hand a small balance of 18s. 3½d.

THE NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL.

At the last meeting of the Council the following resolution on War Loans was discussed and adopted: "The National Peace Council, having in view the fact that the sinews of war tend to become more and more a matter of the financial assistance available, and that such financial assistance given by the subjects of non-belligerent States is an obvious infringement of professed neutrality and tends to prolong war in the interests of speculators in war loans, calls upon public opinion generally to discourage any loan flotation in London on behalf of Turkey and the Balkan States now engaged in war.

"Further, it also urges upon the Government such action as will lead to an understanding between the Sovereign States represented at the Third Hague Conference which shall render such loans a direct infringement of neutrality."

Correction.—We regret that in the list of subscribers to the Sustentation Fund, which was published last week, the contribution of Mrs. Hans Renold appeared as 5s. instead of £5. We are requested to add that Mr. Renold, who has been abroad for some time, has just contributed £25.

ON Monday, November 25, at 5.30 p.m., at Prince Henry's Room, 17, Fleet-street, E.C., Mr. John Russell, M.A., will give a Demonstration Moral Lesson to a Class of Children on "Discipline." The meeting, which is under the auspices of the Moral Education League, will be open to the public. The quarterly meeting of members and friends of the Moral Education League will be held on Friday, November 27, at 8 p.m., when Dr. F. H. Hayward will deliver an address—"The Experimental Vindication of the Moral Education League." There will be a social meeting open to the public at 7 p.m.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

"MEDICAL BENEFIT IN GERMANY AND DENMARK."

THE appearance of Dr. I. G. Gibbon's study of the experience of Germany and Denmark in the matter of insurance against sickness is appropriate at a time when our Insurance Act is being so hotly discussed, not infrequently with more heat than light. These two countries have had insurance schemes in existence since 1884 and 1893 respectively, the German being compulsory, the Danish voluntary. Therefore, both from the point of view of time, and of system, the experience of the practical working of the two schemes cannot but be instructive. The same kind of practical difficulty seems to have arisen within them as have already appeared with us or are expected by some critics. For instance, the insurance societies at Leipsic and Cologne fell foul of the doctors, who demanded a higher capitation fee. Dr. Gibbon deals in detail with the methods prevailing in the two countries as to the choice and remuneration of medical practitioners, the control of the medical service, the provision of medical and surgical requirements, institutional benefit, and so on. In a series of valuable appendices he reprints also the agreements between insurance societies and medical practitioners in Cologne, Munich, Frankfurt, Stuttgart, Copenhagen, and other interesting documents. But most interesting and apposite of all are the conclusions which he draws as a result of a scientific study of the working of the German and Danish systems, and as these are set down in quotable form, some of the most striking may here be reproduced.

(1) Medical benefit should be provided by insurance societies in kind and without the interposition of an intermediate body.

(2) Agreements as regards medical service should be made between (a) societies or federations of societies, and (b) the doctors as an organised corporate body. Similarly remuneration should be in the form of capitation payments by societies to the organised association of doctors, to be distributed by the association among the several doctors according to services rendered.

(3) Insured persons should have free choice of doctor.

(4) Control of the medical service should be exercised chiefly through the organisation of the doctors.

(5) The provision of institutional treatment is essential for adequate medical benefit, but it is liable to abuse and must be kept within narrow limits.

(6) The provision of medical benefit is attended with grave dangers, especially of valetudinarianism, Germany in particular having suffered much from this difficulty.

Lastly, Dr. Gibbon suggests (1) that while the provision of all benefit on an insurance basis is the ideal, it would be a great advantage to make each insured person pay out of his own pocket for a small part of the cost of medical service and medical and surgical requirements, and (2) that systematic measures should be adopted for educating the insured public in matters touching health and treatment.

This volume is a most useful addendum to Dr. Gibbon's former study of "Unemployment Insurance," and both are indispensable to anyone who wishes to take a comprehensive view of the whole question of national insurance, but is unable to make the necessary detailed investigations for himself.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Chowbent.—The choir of the Chowbent Chapel won the challenge shield on Saturday, November 2, at a musical competition for church and chapel choirs within a radius of eight miles of Leigh (Lancs.), in which Parliamentary division Chowbent is included. Nine choirs competed. The piece appointed to be sung was "The Radiant Morn," and Messrs. Emylin Davies, F.R.C.O., and D. D. Parry, A.R.C.M., were the adjudicators, and in their award they say of the Chowbent choir's performance:—"The opening bars were very nicely sung. There was good expression. The unison was very good. The quality of the altos was excellent, in some places particularly so. There was also a roundness of tone and blend which was not so noticeable in the other choirs. The expression throughout was excellent. There was fine tone, and the words were always clear and distinct. It was undoubtedly a well-finished, devotional, and convincing rendering. The harmony throughout was very pure." The organist and choir master is Mr. Thomas Martin, F.R.C.O.

London: Acton.—A lecture on "George Crabbe" was delivered at the Creffield-road Church on November 12 by Mr. J. A. Fallows, M.A. Mr. F. J. Gould, of the Moral Education League, presided over an appreciative audience, who listened with much interest to the lecturer's crisp and clear account of Crabbe's poetry, and of the social conditions of rural life in the eighteenth century, of which it affords so vivid a picture. After a short discussion a vote of thanks was proposed by the Rev. A. C. Holden, seconded by Mr. Barnes, and carried unanimously.

London: Kilburn.—The Rev. Charles Roper makes an appeal on behalf of the Sunday school at Quex-road, which is greatly in need of a piano. The Sunday school, which is only two years old, numbers 180 scholars with an average attendance of nearly 140. All save the infants have now to be accommodated in the church. There is an American organ, but the teachers find it very inadequate for leading the singing, as many of the children come from the poorest homes and have to be taught the hymns and their tunes. They would be very much encouraged and helped if any reader of THE INQUIRER could spare them a piano not in use for this purpose, or give one in exchange for the American organ, and Mr. Roper will be glad to receive any communications on the subject at 16, Westbere-road, Cricklewood, N.W.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—On Friday, November 8, at Essex Hall, Dr. J. E. Odgers, of Manchester College, Oxford, delivered the first of a series of four lectures on "The History of the Unitarian Movement." The particular subject for the evening was "Controversy in the Early Church." Dr. Odgers explained how the controversy concerning the Trinity had arisen out of the earlier conception of the Divine "Economy"—the thought of God as a "Household of Influences"; how the rigidity of the creeds was a gradual outcome of the necessity for a statement of common principles which should bind all who claimed to "accept Christ." In the strangely diverse communities in which the Christian Church had its foundations, the "acceptance of Christ" meant, in the beginning, many different things. Dr. Odgers showed how differing environment and traditions led to differing forms of Christianity, and how many of these came to be branded as "heresies." The lecture concluded with a short survey of the Arian controversy.

London: Mansford-street.—The forty-fifth annual meeting of past and present scholars, teachers and workers of Spicer-street and Mansford-street Mission was held on Wednesday, November 6. The Rev. Gordon Cooper welcomed the guests on behalf of the present members of the school. There was a good attendance.

Marple.—A bazaar was held on the 8th and 9th inst. in the Recreation Rooms in aid of the funds of the newly-established Unitarian Church. It was opened on Friday by Mr. Charles Hawksley, president of the B. & F.U.A., Lieut.-Col. Pollitt, of Ashton, in the chair. Mr. J. Hall Brooks, of Hyde, performed the opening ceremony on Saturday, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson presiding. The effort was highly successful, the total receipts amounting to over £250. Donations to the building fund will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the secretary, Mr. Alfred Hirst, Holmleigh, Marple, and the minister, the Rev. Leonard Short, Glencairn, Willow-grove, Marple.

Mossley.—A successful Guild anniversary was held in the Lower Mossley-street Chapel on Monday, November 4. The service was conducted by the President, the Rev. H. Fisher Short. Mr. Harold Whitaker, the secretary, read an excellent report of the work of the society, and special addresses were given by the Rev. F. J. Wharton, United Methodist, on "Churchmanship: An Opportunity for Heroism"; the Rev. John Ellis on "Not What we Give, but What we Share"; the Rev. C. M. Wright, M.A., secretary of the Guilds' Union, on "Helping the Future."

Preston: Resignation.—The Rev. Charles Travers, after a ministry of over eight years at the Unitarian Chapel, Church-street, has resigned.

Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—A conference of members of the Union was held at the Universalist Church, Stenhouse-muir, on Saturday, November 2. Representatives from all the Unitarian Sunday schools in Scotland were present. The chair was taken by the President of the Union, Miss C. S. Brown, Edinburgh, who extended a warm welcome to the delegates, and a paper was read on "The Religious Education of the Child" by the Rev. T. M. Falconer, B.Litt. Mr. Falconer pleaded that the child is not a machine to be stuffed with any food that is prepared for him, but a bundle of possibilities awaiting development, and that he must be led therefore to develop according to the laws of his own nature, every chance being given for his sympathies and tendencies to grow along the right lines. A second paper on "A Suggested Basis for a Scheme of Lessons" was given by Dr. Wood. A short discussion followed.

Southern Unitarian Association.—On Tuesday evening, November 12, a special service of recognition was held in the Hill-street Chapel, Poole, to welcome the Rev. Frank Coleman, of Wareham, as a fully accredited minister. Mr. Coleman has been in charge of the Wareham congregation as a lay-worker for the past three years, and as reported last week, has now passed the examinations in the course of reading prepared by the National Conference, and has received the Southern Advisory Committee's certificate of recognition. Members of the Wareham, Poole, and Bournemouth congregations joined together in the service, the first part of which was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis. Addresses of welcome were given by the Rev. H. S. Solly, President of the Association, and the Rev. A. R. Andreae, of Southampton; and after Mr. Coleman had acknowledged the welcome, the Rev. W. B. Matthews, of Poole, concluded the service with prayer and benediction. The Rev. C. C. Coe was also present.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

"FOR LOVE OF BEASTS."

All humane people will be grateful to Mr. Galsworthy for writing the series of short articles "For Love of Beasts," which have just been reprinted from the Pall Mall Gazette and issued as a pamphlet by the Animals' Friend Society. They are in the form of dialogues which we are led to suppose took place between the writer, and an earnest friend who cannot repress his indignation when he sees larks and linnets in cages, goldfish in glass bowls, pigeons being shot at Monte Carlo, women buying "aigrettes," or hares being "coursed." The questions which he puts on these subjects are ironical, but searching, and every point in favour of the "beasts" is brought out in a way which leaves the reader much less comfortable than if he had never been asked in this cruel way to look facts in the face. Mr. Galsworthy knows that "there is no disservice one can do to all these helpless things so great as to ride past the hounds, to fly so far in front of public feeling as to cause nausea." On the other hand, he does not believe in shutting our eyes to what we think cannot be remedied, and pretending that it is not our business to roundly tell the truth even at the risk of being called "sentimental humanitarians." That seems to him like minding one's own business "because it is so jolly comfortable to do so," and we cannot but agree with him.

BREAM DOWN BIRD SANCTUARY.

"Shooting rights" over Bream Down, near Weston-super-Mare, have been secured, as we stated a few weeks ago, by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, in order that an efficiently guarded bird sanctuary may be maintained there. It is pointed out by the secretary, however, that this scheme cannot be carried out without money to pay rent and watchers, and subscriptions or donations are urgently needed. The place is peculiarly suited for the purpose of a sanctuary—a spur of the Mendip Hills, jutting out into the Atlantic, within easy reach of a popular watering-place yet practically cut off from easy approach by a tidal estuary, and guarded at its narrow neck by the house of the farmer who feeds his sheep on the hill. It is a ridge of limestone rock, with rough and precipitous sides, and with downland grass and a multitude of wild-flowers on its summit and in its crevices. This "Hill of Birds" is, indeed, the most important and romantic place of its kind that yet exists in these islands, and only the funds are needed to ensure it to the birds as a breeding and dwelling place in perpetuity. Contributions will be gratefully received by the Society, and the autumn number of Bird Notes and News containing a further account of the Hill, and of the general work of the Watchers' Fund, will be sent to anyone interested on application to the Secretary at 23, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W.

MR. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD.

The publishing world has sustained a loss in the death of Mr. William Blackwood at the age of 76. He was the grandson of the founder of the celebrated publishing business, and was born in Lucknow. Mr. Blackwood entered the business in 1857, and on the death of his uncle, Mr. John Blackwood, in 1879, the entire control of it devolved upon him. He discharged his responsibility in a steady and judicious manner, and if his editorship of Blackwood's Magazine was marked by no striking innovations, he collected around him a band of capable writers, and managed the journal so successfully that it has survived a number of competitors. Mr. Blackwood was a man of simple and courteous manners, with a great sense of personal rectitude, and the type of mind which clings tenaciously to the old, and is rather afraid of going out to meet the new.

NURSERY BOOKS 100 YEARS AGO.

One of the features of the Children's Welfare Exhibition is to be a number of old books for children collected by Mr. C. T. Owen, which will, no doubt, be examined with curiosity by young and old. Moral tales are sure to abound, and it is said that there are a good many bogey-books published at a time when parents used to frighten their refractory children into obedience by threatening them with "Boney."

THE PEASANT ARTS FELLOWSHIP.

Several social evenings have been arranged in connection with the Peasant Arts Fellowship to be held at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, during the winter. Lectures are to be given by Mr. Godfrey Blount, the Rev. A. H. Baverstock, and Mr. Ernest Rhys, on November 20, December 18, and January 15 respectively. The Peasant Arts Society is now showing both at 17, Duke-street, Manchester-square, and High-street, Haslemere, in addition to hand-woven silks, linen, tapestry and pile rugs, Normandy brass milk-cans, excellent for hot water, home-made peasant pottery, and hand-spun, hand-woven, vegetable-dyed tweed. Such exhibitions are a revolt against the idea, as Mr. Granville Barker said the other day at the opening of the "English-woman" Exhibition, that you can turn out anything you want by the aid of machinery, and that the era of machinery necessarily marks a great advance in civilisation in the best sense of the word.

THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

Mr. R. N. Mudholkar is the president-elect of the Indian National Congress which will meet in December. He is a lawyer, belonging to a distinguished family, and a member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council. Mr. Mudholkar ardently supports industrial enterprises, and has for a long time been active in public affairs in the Central Provinces.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE conclusion of an armistice of six days between Turkey and Bulgaria raises lively hopes of peace. The Allies are in a position to dictate terms if they do not push matters to extremes and determine to enter Constantinople. It is difficult to believe that there can be a permanent settlement while Constantinople and a small strip of territory remain in the hands of the Turks as a forlorn symbol of their vanished dominion in Europe. But at the present moment a policy of restraint on the part of the Balkan States is probably the highest political wisdom. Looking at the matter entirely from their point of view, the process of healthy internal development would be frustrated, if any provocative opening were given to the Great Powers to impose terms from outside. With the exception of the opposition of Austria to a Servian port on the Adriatic, there is, fortunately, little disposition to make the attempt. Europe is too conscious of its failure to solve the Eastern Question and the discredit it has earned as the cautious patron of misgovernment, to indulge in anything but feelings of relief if this swift and dramatic war takes the whole matter out of its hands.

THE strike among the hollow-ware workers in the Black Country has come to an end with the concession to the work-people of better terms in wages and hours. The dispute has been a singularly difficult one, owing to the number of small employers, some of whom have been more willing than others to improve the conditions of labour. The special correspondent of the Daily Citizen points out that the settlement means an all-round advance for the men both on time and piece rates, in addition to the securing of 8½d. an hour for all Government contract work. The 10s. minimum won by the women means an increase in many cases of as much as 3s. 6d. and 4s. per week. In cases where more has been paid for any particular work no reduction will, of course, be allowed. The settlement includes the reinstatement of all union workers and the establishment of a uniform 54-hour week. It may justly be described as a notable victory in the long struggle against sweated industry.

It is impossible at the time of writing to forecast the result of the vote at Cambridge on Friday on the proposal to abolish the restrictions which at present confine degrees in Divinity to members of the Church of England. Every step in University reform is proverbially difficult, and even the unanimous approval of the divinity professors may have little effect upon the serried ranks of the country clergy. There is apparently some danger of weak compromise, conceding the right of Nonconformists to the degree provided that some test of Christian belief is still exacted. No true friend of the freedom of scholarship can entertain an idea of this kind for a moment. Apart from the difficulty of framing such a test, it would be in practice simply a new principle of exclusion, and continue to bar the way to the degree to many men of brilliant gifts and sensitive conscience. A degree may be a badge of ecclesiastical approval or of intellectual attainments, but in the modern world it cannot be both at the same time.

ON this fatuous proposal, Professor Moulton has written the following illuminating comment in the Manchester Guardian :—" Personally, I confess I see no adequate reason for being afraid of the consequences of complete freedom. We have never been embarrassed in the least by the freedom which is fundamental in the Theological Faculty in Manchester University, to which the Bishop of Manchester has just given such generous testimony. In practice, 90 per cent. of the future candidates for B.D. and D.D. at Cambridge will be as orthodox as the Anglican clergy to whom the degrees are at present restricted. And if occasionally a distinguished scholar should send in work which, on its merits, claims the degree, while holding religious opinions differing widely from those for which the Divinity School of Cambridge has hitherto stood, after all the damage done to Christian belief is incon siderable enough. The faith, if it is worth anything, must be able to take care of itself, and I for one have no fear."

THE first of the Lindsey Hall Lectures was given last week by Dr. L. P. Jacks. His subject, the Need of Salvation, took him into some of the most fruitful fields of religious psychology. The other lecturers in the series will be Canon Lilley, Mr. Wicksteed, Principal Carpenter, and Dr. James Moffatt, the eminent New Testament scholar. That a common platform of this kind for the study and exposition of some of the deepest themes of religion no longer excites surprise or alarm is a welcome sign of progress in mutual understanding. Slowly, the public mind is coming to the inevitable conclusion that the study of religion can derive no credit from sectional labels, and that all sectarian answers to the fundamental questions of life are in danger of being tainted at their source. But for many of us it is still one of the hardest lessons that we have to learn, that the victory of the Spirit does not mean victory for ourselves and the triumphant waving of our own flag, but a new era for the Church of God.

THE pulpit at Westminster Abbey is the pulpit of the nation in a sense which hardly applies to any other pulpit in the land. Canon Barnett made a noble use of its privileges last Sunday afternoon, when he dealt with the whole problem of "the woman who is a sinner," which is so prominently before the public mind at the present time. Following closely after Canon Henson's fearless denunciation of the Putumayo horrors, the sermon rouses the hope that some of our ancient foundations may make it their great business to instruct and inspire the national conscience with all plainness of speech, telling the modern Englishman in words which will burn in his ears the nature of his sin and its inevitable doom. In a place like Westminster Abbey a preacher can throw off the reserves which are often necessary in more private assemblies. He is speaking no longer to a small group of his friends and acquaintance, but to a whole people.

* * *

ARTIFEX devotes his weekly article in the Manchester Guardian to the subject of religious retreats for working-men. At first sight it may look like one of the unpractical idealisms of the clerical mind, but the writer is able to call attention to interesting movements in Germany, France and the United States. He has been specially impressed by the spread of definitely Christian propaganda among German and French working-men, and he comes to the conclusion that "the reign of anti-religious and materialistic views among the working-classes, both at home and abroad, is drawing to a close." Here, however, we think some questions may not be out of place. Has Artifex examined the forces which are behind some of these movements and found them void of offence? How far, for instance, are they guided by ecclesiastical authority in order to curb the power of a certain form of social propaganda, and to break the growing sense of solidarity among working-men? In so far as they lend themselves to the exploitation of religion for political purposes, they hardly deserve the approval which Artifex is inclined to bestow upon them.

A DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.

IT is one of the strangest of delusions that by proclaiming the bankruptcy of reason we can make men sure of God. It is simply a variant of the message, "Flee from the wrath to come," which seeks by appeals to fear or the more subtle depreciation of all our human powers to drive men like a crowd of frightened sheep into the fold of CHRIST. From this point of view Christianity has little to do with the quiet transformation of character, and the innate pieties of an honest and good heart, and the discipleship which consists in daily growth without any sense of inward convulsion in the knowledge and the love of God. This is, we are told, a weak and almost spurious kind of religion. For genuine faith everything must be swift, startling, theatrical, bizarre. It will run riot in the miraculous and despise what is merely natural; and for its language it will choose not the human speech of the Sermon on the Mount, but the highly seasoned periods of ecclesiastical rhetoric. There has been a strange revival lately of this kind of Christian apology, and it is enlisting many able men in its service. Among them Dr. FIGGIS is at the present moment facile princeps. He brings to his task a rich fund of historical knowledge, a comprehensive acquaintance with modern books and plays, and a luxuriant if rather metallic style. He mounts up with wings like an eagle on the strong wings of reaction. He leaves the mind dazzled and amazed, and he wins converts through their sheer inability to resist the tremendous onslaught of his dogmatism. But he cannot do these things without paying the price, and his earlier book, "The Gospel and Human Needs," strikes us as more religious than "Civilization at the Cross Roads,"* which is the subject of a good deal of comment at the present time.

We propose in this article to state very briefly why we regard this book, and the whole type of argument which it represents, as perverse and lacking in sound perception. We may confine ourselves to three lines of criticism.

Dr. FIGGIS' teaching is marked by the extraordinary vagueness of its theistic belief. He seems to proceed on the assumption that if he can banish God from the world altogether, Christianity in the form of a miraculous revelation will come in all the more easily to fill the vacuum. "The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God," he says in one place, "to which some would fain reduce Christianity in the hope of making it easy and universal, is to me the profoundest of all stumbling-blocks." A saying like this is an illuminating commentary on the trend of his mind, and the fatal inadequacy of his position. We remember certain words in the New Testament about the inward witness. We remember the assumption of a natural response in his hearers which underlies all the teaching of CHRIST. We remember the noble theistic faith of psalmist and prophet, which Christianity took for its foundation. Any teacher who ignores these things in order to enhance the unique value of his own theory, or uses agnosticism as a plea for the necessity of miracles, is profoundly disloyal to the teaching and spirit of CHRIST. Christianity as an irruption of supernatural power into a world naturally alien from God has tremendous difficulties to face, and the chief of them is this, that it has no possible connection with the historical records in the Bible.

The position represented by Dr. FIGGIS is also guilty of a failure to appreciate the character of CHRIST. He is so concerned with a supernatural figure and a series of shattering events, that he is blind to the depth and beauty of the human appeal. The reason for this obliquity of vision is not far to seek. Dr. FIGGIS has discovered in Dr. SCHWEITZER and the other protagonists of the "apocalyptic" school useful allies in the task of discrediting what he calls the "liberal" view of Christianity. But violent reaction is no friend to the love of truth, and it is seldom a question of all or none between rival critical theories. No amount of invective will destroy the permanent acquisitions of the "liberal" school or the vastness of the benefit which they have conferred upon modern Christianity, chiefly by restoring the character of CHRIST as men can understand it and love it to its central position, and kindling once again the thought of an "Imitatio Christi" as the source of a robust Christian piety. In the ancient controversies men were guided by a true instinct when they clung, despite logical inconsistencies, to the true humanity of CHRIST; and all theories which tend to obscure the genuine human traits in their devotion to what is mysterious and inexplicable stand condemned at the bar of historical judgment and in the light of the deepest human needs.

* London: Longmans & Co. 5s. net.

Perhaps no man can be a good controversialist unless he has some innate lack of fairness or a strictly limited sympathy. Dr. FIGGIS is as much absorbed in the stormy progress of his message as if he were conducting an American Presidential Campaign. Some luridness of atmosphere and violence of language are inseparable from his method. Like all who mount the ecclesiastical hustings he must regard the world as divided into friends and foes, and be careful to show up the opinions of the opposite camp in the worst possible light. It is an exhilarating game as long as it lasts, but in the end he fails tragically to make any religious impression upon a multitude of people. In the swift sword play of his argument he hardly tries to understand them, and only succeeds in holding up to ridicule some foolish travesty of their opinions. He assumes, for instance, that disbelief in miracles is necessarily the sign of a crude materialism and a waning faith in God. He must know, we imagine, that for many people the exact reverse is the case. Their faith in God is inseparable from their confidence in ordered movement and an element of moral law-abidingness in the highest affection, and they dismiss the belief in miracles with a feeling of relief because God is more wonderful and his help more real without them. Elsewhere, Dr. FIGGIS describes the Liberal Christians, with whom he disagrees, as "a small circle of pedants, who were anxious to retain the name and prestige of Christians, while rejecting every element that gave the Faith its power. All they held was a mere morality, but they wanted to dignify it with the name of religion." Perhaps such language may be permissible if Dr. FIGGIS is simply out to win votes for his ecclesiastical theory; but anyone who aspires to be a Christian teacher has higher functions to fulfil. Will it help to establish the kingdom of the truth and to plant habits of truthfulness and just judgment in the hearts of men?

We have written as we have done with some unwillingness, because we have a sincere admiration for the earnestness which glows in many pages of this book and the high-hearted devotion of its author to the cause of religion. We desire always to see the best in every form of Christian teaching which is put forward for the helping of the world, even when we are most conscious of our points of disagreement with it. But we cannot in this case refrain from a word of grave warning, for we view this violent reaction into a crude super-naturalism with deep concern for the future of religion. When this strange miracle play has run its course, in which the spirits of evil are represented by science and reason and every form of liberal thought, when the curtain is rung down and the lights extinguished, the darkness will settle with a heavier pall upon the souls of men. Brilliant spectacular effects are a poor substitute for the divine radiance of the common day.

THE HUMANITARIAN PLEA.

WE publish some further letters to-day on the subject of Flogging. We think it is not unfair to ask some of our correspondents to try to understand the reasons for our opposition—they have not been formed hastily, nor are they the result of an easy-going indifference—and to answer the arguments of penal reformers with something more convincing than an appeal to moral indignation.

It is assumed that flogging will act as a deterrent; but that is one of the questions in dispute. There is a great deal of evidence, which has been collected and studied, which suggests that it is likely to have a precisely opposite effect.

There is further a great deal of evidence, which ought not to be ignored, to the effect that barbarous forms of punishment tend to degrade the whole tone of society. Savage crimes, both in their frequency and intensity, bear some proportion to the savagery with which the law deals with them. For anybody with a gift of social imagination there is no such thing as an isolated crime with a specially drastic form of punishment which we can refuse to apply to anything else. In the very act of decreeing this particular penalty we are letting loose social forces of incalculable magnitude and adding strength to the demand, which already exists, for a reversion to scourging in many other cases which rouse us to righteous anger.

It is apparently necessary to insist once again that the humanitarian is not a weak sentimentalist, who has such a dislike of pain on its physical side that he is blind to the horror of moral evil and the apparently bottomless depths of human degradation. Exactly the opposite is the case. It is often the men who are despised as humanitarians who feel the appalling nature of the wrong that man commits against man so deeply, that it is seldom absent as a gnawing pain in the heart. If they are not roused by spasms of indignation it is because they are indignant all the time, and have studied these questions through the long years while the crowd was careless or asleep, and formed convictions on the question of punishment in its relation to the welfare of society and the redemption of the criminal, which are not easily shaken. We have no claim to be of their company; but we think that at the present moment they are better guides for us through the bewildering thickets of moral indignation than some others, who fly to violence more as a satisfaction to their pent-up feeling than because they are convinced that it will do any permanent good.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

UNDER THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

THE oldest of the Continents is under the Southern Cross. First of all present lands it reared itself above the enveloping sea, and stands to-day hoary and scarred with the turmoils of a thousand ages. Compared with the Alps, its mountain ranges are the worn-down teeth of some ancient centenarian, who looks with envy upon the smiling faces of the youngest generation at his feet. Its native life, both animal and vegetable, is said with truth to be a museum of antiquities. Owing to its strangely age-long isolation in the boundless Southern seas, forms and structures counted as prehistoric in other lands are here the dominant forms of life. Here is to be found the missing link between bird and animal, and in living flesh will be seen some of the earliest forms of mammalian development. Only in bird-life has the rest of the world outspanned within the lonely fence which divides it from its fellow Continents, and in gorgeous colouring it ranks first among the winged creation.

But it is little over a century since the vast and silent ocean barriers which kept this great Southern Continent from contact with the busy life of Earth, have been pierced. And this, strange to say, has been done by a nation whose homeland is almost at its antipodes on the Globe. An interesting and fateful experiment is being made in this Land of the Southern Cross. A white race from under the Great Bear, dwellers in the grey North, whose island homes are wrapped in cloud and fog for great portions of the year, have gone far overseas to a land of radiant light and cheerfulness. From a region where the sun shines feebly through the mist on to the bare earth, and the trees are naked to the cold wind for months at a time, where life has been so hard and the skies so gloomy that they have been bleached white, these pale-faced dwellers in the mists have gone to a land with a Mediterranean climate, whose deep blue sky forms a striking setting for its background of clear faint mountain ranges in the far distances. They have gone to where the trees are leafy all the year round, where the flowers never cease, while the singing birds practise their roundelays as in eternal springtime.

They have made the same experiment which the forefathers of the ancient Greeks made when they left the foggy Baltic and settled by the Ægean Sea. Already a new nation is being born, which bids fair to be a Southern development of the British race, with all the Southern gaiety and zest of life. But there is a vastness about their new homeland which is wanting to Greece and Italy. It is a very roomy cradle for an infant race. As an old land, it has a touch of sadness about it, such as seems inevitable in that which has been very long. This makes a curious blend with the buoyancy and lightheartedness of a youthful people. The trees send up their disordered arms towards heaven, as if in weariness at the fight with drought and flood. In the dazzling mid-day sunlight, there is a silence in the forest or on the wide plains which bespeaks a hitherto lonely land. The interminable plains of the interior are like the great sea-spaces, and the horizon has often nothing to break its perfectly level expanse. It is a very big country, and a sense of its bigness seems gradually to become a kind of second nature in its inhabitants.

The population is practically all concentrated on the eastern and south-eastern coast, at a distance from the sea of not much more than the width of England, but extending over a coast-line of a couple of thousand miles. Thus an England at its widest, reaching from the Shetlands to Gibraltar, is a fairly spacious territory for a young nation to grow up in. Its coastline has every variety of climate, from the tropical regions of the North to the almost English rigour of the winter in the mountain districts of the South.

But over it all pours the boundless, dazzling, decisive sunshine, bringing out every detail of the distant landscape, casting black shadows that silhouette their substantial causes with a clearness and delicacy unknown in these moister climes. Fleecy clouds float attendance in the bright blue sky, and the deep ocean swell rolls on unceasingly in waves that rear their huge sea-green fronts to the shore, then gradually curl in white foam along their edges, and at last fall with a roar on the long white stretches of beach, or break themselves into clouds of spray on the broken masses of rock at the feet of the jagged headlands. There is a stillness about the solemn sunlight only broken by the deep murmur of the breakers, and as one looks to the west with the setting sun, the great Continent seems to receive it like a ball of fire into its bosom. The fascination of the land creeps over the solitary watcher, its vastness, its hidden mystery, its promise of good, and yet its terribly potent power of ill. Far away into the dim West it stretches, almost hidden by the blinding glory of the setting sun, which fills the sky with its fiery glow, and paints the clouds in colours no human hands can fix.

Life is not made up of easy paths and gentle dalliances for those who follow that ardent guide. An angel with flaming sword keeps guard over this Paradise, and at times, in his fierce fury, reduces it to a desert. But the mountains are his gateway, and not till they are crossed does the settler feel his sword-thrusts.

These mountains are fit guardians of that strange interior. They are full of deep valleys, the sides of which are sheer precipices, hundreds of feet deep, and all is covered by a thin eucalyptus forest, which stretches out at one's feet far away into the blue distances. The ringing note of the bell-bird, wonderfully clear and sweet, sounds through the trees, and every now and then a chorus of giant kingfishers, or laughing jackasses, as they are popularly called, fills the bush with laughter as of lost souls. Then will be heard the exquisite music of the magpie, or pied crow, one of the winningest, cheekiest, and most engaging of bird companions.

"Over the mountains" is a call of mingled charm and terror to the coast-dweller. On the coast Nature is comparatively mild and gentle, and seldom does torrid heat scorch the land; but over the mountains—that is where the sheep dwell, and they are not partial to humankind. They demand the wide spaces of the earth, where land and sky seem to meet in the mid-day sun as a globe of fire, where the hot rays beat down on the cracked soil and send the air dancing into intoxicated mirage at their embrace. Nature is a hard and grimly grey mistress for the toiling farmer in England; but she is coy to a proverb with his brother under the Southern Cross. At one time she will kiss his feet with the glorious green grass, thick with yellow "everlasting" flowers or white with large daisies, and vivid are the splashes of colour, many acres wide, which these and other flowers make as her centrepieces on the wide table which she has set for her puny servants on the great plains. But then her mood will change, and why it changes is known only to her own sweet self. She seems at times to develop into some monstrous Gorgon, from whose pitiless glance the exhausted land can find no escape. Again and again does she strike down her feeble suitors, but with magnificent courage do they as often woo her, never losing heart, never giving up the fight, always filled with a strangely tenacious hope that yet they will gain her, that sooner or later they will win her graces in their fateful courtship. The weakest are pitilessly pushed to the wall. It needs a man with a stout, brave heart to face that great lone land which is "over the mountains," a veritable land of the Golden Fleece, with a dragon to guard its treasures.

Only those who have the blood of heroes in their veins can win the fight in this great back-country. What prodigies of valour must its earliest Argonauts have performed! What incredible labours by a mere handful of feeble folk, the population of some English village, to have brought under the sway of civilisation realms as large as European kingdoms! Nothing daunted them, nothing turned them back, not drought nor flood nor fire, not the grim loneliness of the pathless forest, nor the overwhelming silence and vastness of the open plains, where the sky seems to rear itself up from the far horizon and then to envelop itself around its human victim in an all-embracing grip that mocks his puny efforts to escape.

What a strange fascination does that sunny southland cast over the sons of its soil and those whom she has beckoned from afar! Do what they will, they cannot escape the haunting spell of its weird music. Snatches of woodland notes, with a timbre all their own, come floating to the ears of the exile. He is continually catching a glimpse of sunlit hill and dale, of forest paths at mid-day, flecked with moving shadows, and again of lonely tracks over the plains when surprised by the quick darkness, with but the faint starlight as a guide. He sees once more the glistering Milky Way, shining on frosty winter nights with a heavenly brilliance that makes the sky a sea of glory. And enthroned among them, with more than regal magnificence, is the Southern Cross, keeping guard over the first of lands and the last of nations, looking down on scenes of human toil and endurance, of marvellous success and dogged failure, symbol itself of Earth's Greatest Tragedy, but harbinger of a more than earthly joy of victory over the forces that oppose.

THE CHALLENGE OF SUFFERING.

THE personal confessions of a distinguished man of action, and of ample knowledge and culture, cannot fail to be of living interest, and Sir Francis Younghusband in his "Thoughts During Convalescence*" holds our attention to the end. We recognise, as we read, the voice of one who has seen much of the world, through experience both in the Army and in civil government, in India and South Africa, and as a traveller, notably through Central Asia and Tibet. Of all this we are reminded by incidental references in these pages, but the motive of the book is to face the ultimate question of the meaning of life. It is the record of convictions arrived at after severe trials of personal suffering and sorrow and a vivid realisation of the awful calamities of Nature, such as the Messina earthquake, and an Indian famine, through which, as an administrator, the author had passed. The ironies of fate were brought very painfully home to him when Major Bretherton, the finest officer of his expedition to Lhasa, was drowned through an accident to a raft in crossing a flooded river in Tibet within three days' march of their goal; and the meaning of personal suffering Sir Francis faced in a very acute form when two years ago he was knocked down by a motor car on a Belgian road and shockingly injured. This last experience is elaborately described in the opening pages of the book, and the resultant frame of mind furnishes the starting point for the subsequent questionings.

What can we say, the convalescent asked, in face of such experiences? What ground have we, amid such unaccountable vicissitudes, for faith in any Divine Providence? The answer given is, we confess, very far from satisfying. Fragments of true and noble spiritual conviction we find, but they are not harmonised in the ultimate surrender which makes the surest strength of religion; and the arraignment of Providence is of the crudest. Because such things happen in the world, we may no longer believe in God as "an external omnipotent Being," "an outside Providence, who created us, who watches over us, and who guides our lives like a merciful Father"; but with this abandonment of earlier anthropomorphic ideas of the "God of our childhood," we look in vain for the deeper apprehension of the reality of God for which we hoped; what is offered is a substitute which misses just the one essential point of surrender and trust in the Eternal. The book bears, indeed, on its title-page the immortal words, "The Kingdom of God is within you," but their promise is not fulfilled. The God of the kingdom here contemplated is not the Eternal, but an unfinished "World Spirit," which has emanated from "vague primordial consciousness," and is "in process of perfecting itself." There is in the universe "a spirit ever urging us to fulfil its purpose," but so far "this impulse has pushed blindly forward, all unconscious what its purpose was. At last in man is arising a consciousness of what that Great Purpose animating all living things actually means" (p. 104). It seems a misuse of language to speak of this blind impulse as "the Holy Spirit," and to find the new position described as an abandonment of the idea of "God the Father," and a realising of "the idea of God the Holy Spirit"; for it is we ourselves who are the greatest thing the universe has yet disclosed, and our only trust, we are told, must be in ourselves and one another. That is where the secret of a true advance in religious thought is missed. Yet sometimes we seem nearer to a satisfying conclusion. The World Spirit is described as "a Holy Spirit radiating upward through all animate beings and finding its fullest expression, in man in love, and in the flowers in beauty" (p. 76), and while we are forbidden "any longer to place our faith in any Providence above ourselves and impotently strive to do its will," we can and must "strive with all our souls to obey the dictates of that impelling Spirit that is within us." Only through truth and virtue can we gain the end of perfect love, and the motive power we must find "in that Holy Spirit which impels us all, and gives us that sense of oneness with the universe from which all future Religion will spring" (p. 186). So that after all it may prove to be not merely self-sufficiency that is urged upon us, and the "human religion" set forth as the ideal after which to strive may find that it is not really without God, in a true and living sense. It is declared, indeed, that men must have "faith in themselves and their own inherent goodness," and be glad that they are "no longer oppressed by having to do the will of another"; but that false note may be resolved into a better harmony by a clearer apprehension of what is implied in our inward loyalty to truth and right and the impulse of pure unselfish love. The man of brave integrity, the prophet of righteousness, knows that the obligation of duty is no oppressive burden, but the very secret of his liberty and joyous strength. Far from trusting in "his own inherent goodness," he has vision of a Goodness immeasurably above his own, and through the passion of his loyalty and aspiring love, in word and deed, becomes the channel of a strength immeasurably greater than his own. "Our sufficiency is from God." In the strength of the Eternal we are strong, the one eternal God, in all and over all, "Holy Spirit" indeed, and our Father.

No other interpretation of the "World Spirit" can permanently satisfy the needs of our deeper life, or account for the growing spiritual vision and capacity of mankind. The burden of the suffering and evil in the world we have simply to accept. The wisest and the most devout are silent before the mystery. What we know is that we are here to resist and to overcome the evil with good, and this we do most surely in that other Strength. In the thought that there is that Other, who understands and cares, who sees through the impenetrable cloud, and is with us in the strife, we find the stronghold of our trust and peace. V. D. D.

BARBAROUS PUNISHMENTS.

SIR,—May I thank you for your thoughtful and convincing article on the reversion to the barbarous punishment of flogging? During the past fortnight it has been my lot to read a very large number of press opinions on the recent debate in the House of Commons, and it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that a Flogging Bill calls forth an immense amount of latent savagery in the public mind. It is deeply to be regretted that so many men in high positions, including judges and bishops, should have directed attention not, as ought to be done, to the underlying causes of crime, and to those intelligent principles of penology which long experience has evolved, but to mere hatred of the criminal and a narrow estimate of what he "deserves."

There is much talk, for instance, of "fitting the punishment to the crime." The rack and the thumb-screw were once supposed to "fit" the crime; then hangings and floggings took the place of the earlier tortures; and now we are beginning to see that the "fit" is by no means a perfect one. The whole theory of retributive punishment is, indeed, untenable, and to attempt to adjust the penalty to what the offender "deserves" must be futile, because some crimes are so horrible that nothing short of equally horrible tortures could possibly repay them.

It is a great relief to turn from this passionate cry for vengeance to such wise, temperate, and humane utterances as that of THE INQUIRER, in which it is recognised that the object to be kept in view is not merely the punishment of the criminal but the good of the community.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY S. SALT.

Humanitarian League, 53, Chancery-lane, W.C.

SIR,—If Mrs. Bramwell Booth's indictment of the White Slave traffic at the London Opera House was really, as Mr. Cunninghame Graham alleges, "a masterpiece of sentimentalism and false reasoning," one is almost tempted to ask, Why, then, talk of punishing anyone at all, apart from flogging? With one sentence only that was uttered at that great meeting does Mr. Graham express his entire concurrence, namely, the advice from the chair to "Keep our heads and be cool." Good counsel for the head at all times, but this is a matter that calls for burning hearts as well as cool heads, and it is no super-heat of sympathy and indignation that will lead us to wrong conclusions here. The peril lies in the cruel coldness of indifference and of abashed propriety to the saddest of all disasters, to the deepest of all forms of shame, and to the real consequences of the basest kind of crime that human society has brought to birth.

The plea that we must go to the fountain head of this terrible evil by abolishing the wrongs of overcrowding and underpaying is true enough, and cannot be reiterated too often or too urgently. But it does not affect the immediate question which society is called on to answer, How to deal judiciously with the criminal class of procurers?

The lash you condemn as "barbarous." What then?

I take it that these men ought to be punished in such a manner as to prevent them from repeating the offence, to bring their crime home to them, and so, if it may be, correct in some measure their perverted nature; and, lastly, to deter others from pursuing the same vile occupation. In your article of November 9, the assumption seems to be that these ends will be best and most humanely attained by resort to the ordinary routine of penal servitude, followed, in the case of foreigners, by expulsion from the country.

But is penal servitude as it exists in operation at the present day the humane and efficacious solvent of crime it is commonly taken to be? Better, I venture to say, for the procurer himself, and therefore better for society, that he should be scourged than that he should take his imprisonment or his banishment without scourging. Why? Because a period of penal servitude is the most morally devastating experience to which a human being can be subjected. In the days of Charles Reade the gaol was as ruinous to the body as the soul; but the unhuman provisions of the modern system by which our criminals are treated almost identically with the swine in the prison farm—a warmed and whitewashed sty for each to lie and feed and fatten in, an apology for work to keep up appetite, and a vast dull margin of gross indolence, with, for the most part, scrupulous defence against the chance of anything occurring to alarm the conscience or move the heart to tenderness or shame or even fear—all this is, to my mind, a very barbarous device and the worst kind of environment into which to bring a person of debased character.

He will sink lower, if it be possible, and it usually is. He will get harder and craftier, more bestial and more cruel, and will embrace every opportunity, of which he will find plenty within the high walls, to inject the virus of his own pernicious nature into his less guilty and less callous comrades. Prisoners and prison officials alike testify to the fact that our sanitary and orderly prisons are the nurseries of the worst kinds of vice, and that the majority of convicts go out at the end of their sentence with baser and more dangerous dispositions than when they entered. They may have had some wholesome touch of restraining fear before they knew from personal experience anything of the life and society of the gaol. But prison has been their specious friend. It has quenched fear and shame at the same time, and left them captains of their earthly destiny (and other they know none) by virtue of a fiendish cynicism. Sin, which cost little before, costs nothing now—nothing beyond a time of restraint which may be endured without serious vexation since it is unavoidable and not uncomfortable.

It were better for that man, far, that he should be scourged, if thereby the least flicker of sensibility to the anguish he has caused others could be roused in his hard heart, for until he knows some pain of fellowship his redemption is hopeless, and the modern prison system, if passable for persons of comparatively generous nature, to whom the swinish hygiene is an intolerable dishonour, is practically void of any agency to cope with the moral atrophy of such a soul as we have in view. It were better for that man—Mrs. Tweedy is right in her telling application of the stern words of Jesus—that he should be scourged. It is his only chance of redemption. Pain alone may break his unscrupulous selfishness. But the prison house, to-day, has no pain for him who has no shame. It gives punishment with an anodyne, and seeming so up-to-date and respectable, it is in reality a more barbarous machine than the lash.

I have referred only to male delinquents. As for women who pursue this awful traffic, I confess I know not how a woman, who proves herself such a traitress to her own sex, can be justly and fitly punished on this side the grave. One thing may be done, however. She may be deterred by a more effective segregation than is, I fear, at present the case, from extending her corrupt influence over other women. But this segregation would be no real punishment, no deterrent from crime, no instrument of reform to a woman of such nature.—Yours, &c.,

H. M. LIVENS.

November 20, 1912.

[We are very glad to print Mr. Livens' attack upon our present system of penal servitude, but we cannot see how he improves it by the addition of flogging to its other forms of degradation. Nor can we understand why he should imagine that we are in favour of it. We have pleaded, and shall continue to do so, that punishment ought always to have some relation to the redemption of the criminal. We are opposed to the present outcry for flogging, for this among other reasons, that it is a terrible set-back to the slow and difficult work of penal reform.—Ed. of INQ.]

SIR,—It was a relief to me to read Mrs. Tweedy's letter in your issue of the 16th inst. In all this humanitarian storm raised by the idea of flogging procurers, the horror which they do seems likely to be forgotten. Of course, all vindictiveness in punishment must be absolutely avoided. It may be their misfortune that these wretches are without moral sense. Individually, I would, as with noxious animals, destroy them, as painlessly as may be, and this I have heard advocated by a man, I am glad to say. Why it should be allowable to hang one who has taken life, and not the often far worse criminal, who deliberately ruins body and soul of hundreds of the most helpless of our population, is incomprehensible to me.

As to the possible degradation of those who inflict the punishment—firstly, it seems not unjust to take some risk, if by so doing we can hope to prevent the degradation of innumerable innocent girls; secondly, why should the flogging be imposed upon prison officials? In our schools, it is not left to servants. As the headmaster undertakes this responsibility, why should not some of our educated and refined men be appointed to undertake the flogging of criminals? I have enough belief in my fellow countrymen to think there are those willing, from high motives, to undertake even such revolting work, for as long as it might be found necessary to use it, as a deterrent. Though panic legislation is bad, an evil which has grown to the frightful extent of the White Slavery cannot be treated with kid gloves. Is not Mr. H. Crook confusing two matters? The low pay of women's work brings them on to the streets. Before we can hope to deal with that far harder question, we may surely do the uttermost in our power to put down this form of slavery, which makes certainly every woman's blood boil to think of.—Yours, &c.

SIR,—I have no word to add to the admirable letter in your last issue signed "Lily M. Tweedy," for the position could not be better stated. But I wish to thank her for expressing so cogently what many of us feel as to the desirability of corporal punishment for the men engaged in the White Slave Traffic. There is all the difference in the world between the infiction and carrying out of a judicial sentence of this kind, and the employment of "torture." The justification for the application of this form of punishment in these cases, as Mrs. Tweedy points out, lies in the well-known fact that this sort of criminal—the coward who uses his intelligence and education to enable him to prey on the unprotected and the innocent—is influenced by the fear of physical pain as by nothing else. In gratitude to those who are thus seeking to protect our sex—while inevitably discriminating to the disadvantage of their own in the matter of punishment—I would have women remember that the "Flogging Clause" is the work of men alone.—Yours, &c.,

SWEATED INDUSTRIES.

SIR,—Under the auspices of the Liverpool Anti-Sweating League, an exhibition of Sweated Industries is to be held on Friday, December 6. It will be of the greatest service to us if friends interested in the social welfare of our people will forward to me information regarding any kinds of sweated industry there may exist in their neighbourhood, giving details of the nature of the occupation, and the rates of pay. I think that any labour under the scale for card box making set up by the Trade Boards Act, viz., 13s. per week for women, may rightly be considered as not a living wage.—Yours, &c.

THE DECLINE OF ARISTOCRACY.

The Decline of Aristocracy. By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.

THIS is a book which will make some people very mad and others very sad, and will be carefully avoided by all the comfortable fanatics of progress, who take for granted that the world is always getting better and that their luxurious way of living is the finest flower of civilisation. For many people the only social problem that concerns them is how to make the poor contented without changing any of the habits of the wealthy. Mr. Ponsonby is a bold man, especially with his antecedents of Eton and Oxford, when he comes forward with a social study of the class, to which he belongs, and treats the rich young swell in a motor car and no useful work to his credit as a disturbing symptom, almost like dock labourers who go on strike. The study has in it the touch of intimacy which many books written by the rich about the poor so often lack; and it is certainly justified in view of the fact that the growth of a parasitic rich class is only the other side of the problem of unemployment and the crude miseries of the slums. People who hug their comforts very close around them, and observe all the necessities of social punctilio, often imagine that they are the elect champions of religion and civilisation; but Mr. Ponsonby tears that delusion to shreds. He has evidently caught a vision of some others, innocent of the gentlemanliness of the public school and the university, who have a sounder instinct for the true values of life.

Undoubtedly, this is a reforming book, but it is based upon a good foundation of history. The English aristocracy owe the tremendous authority which they still exercise to the conflict with absolute monarchy, in which they played a leading part. The reflected glory of that struggle, and the secure position in which groups of leading families with territorial influence entrenched themselves, have continued to our own day. But the pride of the old nobility has been so watered down by the power of industrial wealth to climb into positions of honour that it only affords a very thin covering to the false escutcheons of the nouveaux riches. The peerage, Mr. Ponsonby points out, contains only thirty-seven members who are descendants of peerages founded before the seventeenth century. The plutocracy is not merely a possible danger; it has arrived, and it is no longer at much trouble to conceal its pretensions. It can buy the land, the type of education, the social position, which were formerly the cachet of the gentleman, and it can set the pace in expensive living so fast as to drive all poorer competitors off the field. In a series of very instructive chapters, Mr. Ponsonby analyses the effect of this plutocratic power, and the way in which our exclusive system of education for the sons of rich men ministers to its pride and self-esteem. But meanwhile there has been a distinct decline in intellectual power. A plutocracy may imitate the habits of the old régime for a short time, but it has no inherent capacity for government, and it deteriorates rapidly into idleness and enervating luxury. The leaders in thought and politics and religion come from elsewhere; and the conflict is joined between intellect and high moral purpose and the comradeship of democratic ideals on one side, and the inertia of privilege expressed in terms of hard cash on the other. In such a struggle there can be little doubt on which side ultimate victory will lie; but can that victory be won without much painful wastage of the treasures of the past and some temporary defection from the honour due to real aristocracy of mind and spirit, which saves men from acquiescence in a low average of achievement? That fundamentally is the problem which Mr. Ponsonby sets before us in his book. No wise man will refuse to study it with all the dispassionate care and freedom from social prejudice which he can command.

THE SACRED SHRINE.

The Sacred Shrine, a Study of the Poetry and Art of the Catholic Church. By Yrjö Hirn. London: Macmillan & Co. 14s. net.

THIS learned book is very different from the thin and sentimental essays on mediæval art, adorned with pleasant pictures, to which we have grown accustomed. It is an instructive commentary upon our neglect of Æsthetic as a serious branch of study that one of the few important books on the subject in English should come to us from the University of Finland at Helsingfors. Professor Hirn perceives that a great movement of art can only be understood in the light of the presuppositions and ideas of which it is the emotional expression. The Gothic church, like the Nicene creed, is the language of Christian faith, and has little meaning when it is regarded as a collocation of architectural lines and sumptuous ornament apart from the ritual which created it. In the same way, every important aspect of mediæval Catholic art, whatever subordinate value it may have for the modern mind in its slavery to spiritual impressionism, only becomes luminous with meaning in the light of the distinctively Catholic view of religion. At every point beauty was the handmaid of faith and fancy was disciplined by dogma. It is the thesis of this book that in spite of many alien intrusions, which suggest æsthetic problems of their own, there is such a thing as art which is Catholic in its origin and its aim.

Professor Hirn finds the guiding principle of this Catholic art in the conception of a shrine. The altar, in its earliest form as a tomb, is a shrine for the martyr or the saint. Later, as the mass-table with its ciborium, it is the shrine for something more sacred than relics, and all the splendour of its adornment, and of the ritual which surrounds it, is governed by this thought of a tabernacle which God has chosen for his dwelling. In a similar way the church itself is a shrine, skilfully planned and exquisitely wrought, for the guarding of the altar and other holy things. Professor Hirn applies the same idea with an extraordinary wealth of illustration to the cult of the Virgin Mary. She is the shrine of the Incarnation, and it is this fact which gives her a pre-eminent position in Christian art and creates the luxuriant growth of legendary lore in which the mediæval painters found some of their most gracious themes. It is the thought of what was suitable for the holy and beautiful shrine of the Godhead which lies behind the pious fancy that she was fed by the angels and lived as a girl in the Temple, and after her divine sorrows was taken up into heaven without the pains of death. This shrine symbolism is likewise responsible for the honour paid to St. Anne and the growth of her legend. "The holiest of all contents," Professor Hirn writes, "conveys its holiness to the body in which it has been enshrined, and accordingly Mary's body becomes in its turn a sacred content, which confers distinction upon its covering. In the doctrine of her relationship to Anna, the same thoughts are repeated which are associated with the relationship between the Saviour and His Mother. Thus, Anna becomes a kind of Madonna of the second order, to whom a number of the Holy Virgin's functions are transferred. Both in art and theology many curious results are to be found of this reduplication of the Madonna concept." We have given a very brief outline of the argument, which we have no space to criticise in detail. There are sections of the book which will provide theologians and mediævalists with abundant material for discussion; but there can be only one opinion upon the author's scholarship, the skill with which he has penetrated into forms of religious belief which he does not share, and the reverence with which he has handled matters of delicacy, which it was impossible to avoid in any adequate treatment of the subject. His book is not only a monument of learning, fortified with a bibliography of unusual richness; it is also one of the best commentaries upon mediæval religion for those who wish really to understand its creative ardour, its logical consistency, and its inexhaustible credulity. For us things are not true simply because it seems fitting that they should have happened. History is no longer evolved out of the heart of dogma. That is the measure of the distance between the mediæval and the modern mind.

TWO BOOKS BY CANON HENSLEY HENSON.

The Creed in the Pulpit. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

THE two books which we have placed at the head of this notice illustrate the strength and versatility of Canon Henson's mind. He has made the pulpit at Westminster and St. Margaret's a centre not only for vigorous preaching, but also for sound and scholarly teaching upon the questions of history and criticism which are inseparable from the modern presentation of Christianity. The volume on Puritanism contains a course of six lectures delivered in Westminster Abbey on Friday afternoons. Based on wide reading and sound scholarship, they are clear and popular in style, and they are remarkably successful in avoiding the loss of life and colour which a just and equal view of an exciting period of history so frequently involves. This non-partisan attitude in Church history is very rare, especially when the embers of controversy are still glowing beneath our feet, and it is enough in itself to confer distinction on these pages. Canon Henson is capable of warm-hearted appreciation of the Puritans without blindness to their faults, and his belief that a Presbyterian ascendancy would have been a misfortune for English Christianity does not blunt his tribute to the heroism of the 2,000 ejected ministers. "The victims of the Act of Uniformity," he says, "were not ejected from the National Church for disobedience to the Prayer Book, but for refusing to lay guilt on their consciences by uttering an evident falsehood, and for refusing to acquiesce in a sacrilegious farce. None, therefore, could pretend that they were separatists for slight cause, or question the motives of their compulsory dissent. They went forth to poverty, privation, and suffering." It is no exaggeration to say that we have in these pages the best recent estimate of Puritanism from the spiritual side; at least we know of no other which equals it in fairness and discrimination. We hope that it is only a first sketch for a larger work.

The second volume consists of sermons dealing with the chief articles of the traditional creed in the light of modern knowledge. What it loses in contrast to an ordered treatise from some lack of continuity and sustained argument, it gains in a sense of freshness and actuality. The thought which a man commits to the silent keeping of a book or an article in his study is a very different thing from the thought which is spoken from one of the most prominent pulpits in the land. This is a measure of the real significance of this volume of sermons, with its plea for re-statement and its fearless acceptance of the revolt of the modern intelligence against many of the pre-suppositions of an inherited theology. Here are two passages from the preface which may be taken as illustrations of Canon Henson's point of view and the candour with which it is presented. "Even in 'orthodox' circles there is a widely distributed tendency to admit what may be called non-miraculous interpretations of evangelical narratives. The unceasing polemic against various forms of popular infidelity has brought home to the Christian advocates the great tactical disadvantage in which they are placed by a literal acceptance of miraculous narratives, and there is a readiness to utilise whatever ways of escape the discoveries and theories of physical science may seem to offer." "If dissent from the formularies, though legitimate as fashioning the personal beliefs of the preacher, may only be admitted to his public teaching at the risk of his ejection from office, is it not obvious that sincerity of utterance in the pulpit will be discouraged, and a premium placed on an uncandid economy of speech which might too easily become demoralising? Are the two distinctions which are commonly drawn, on the one hand, between withdrawing a teacher's credentials and fettering free inquiry and research, and, on the other hand, between the position of an official and that of a private member of the Church, really sound? From the point of view of mere practical administration it may be necessary to allow them, but on a deeper view of religious issues, can they be justified? If, as the Apostle says, the Church is 'the pillar and ground of the truth,' then to teach in the Church's name must primarily mean to teach the truth sincerely."

"THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY ATLAS" (Cambridge, at the University Press. 25s. net) is an admirable pictorial companion for all who read history for pleasure or take an intelligent interest in international politics. Such intricate questions as the rearrangement of Europe after the Treaty of Vienna or the distribution of population and railways in the United States become plain to the eye, thanks to its clear arrangement of colours. At the present moment maps 119 and 120 are of special interest, the one of the Ottoman Empire in Europe, 1870-8, and the other of the Balkan Peninsula, 1878-1910. The whole policy of Austria in regard to the Adriatic and her determination to exclude the Balkan States as far as possible from the sea assumes a sort of diagrammatic clearness. We have seldom studied maps which explained a diplomatic situation so eloquently. The atlas, which contains 141 maps, a scholarly introduction, and an elaborate index, is published in a uniform size with the other volumes of the Cambridge history. It is thus happily free from the besetting difficulty of using maps, and makes it one of the most convenient historical atlases on the market.

"THE PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS OF DESCARTES," Vol. II. (Cambridge, at the University Press. 10s. 6d. net), completes the admirable edition which has been translated and edited by Miss E. S. Haldane and Dr. Ross. The first volume contained all the important works, the second being devoted to the "Objections and Replies," together with the Letter to Father Dinet. The "Objections and Replies" deal with the "Meditations" and form a commentary upon it. They are at the same time an interesting mirror of contemporary thought. With these two volumes and Miss Haldane's elaborate biography, the English student of Descartes has the fullest kind of equipment he can desire.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Cambridge University Press will publish very shortly "Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture," in two volumes, by T. G. Jackson, R.A. This work will contain an account of the development in Eastern and Northern Europe of Post-Roman architecture from the fourth to the twelfth century, with more than 300 illustrations, mostly from the author's sketches. It is attempted, not merely to describe the architecture, but to explain it by the social and political history of the time. The description of the churches at Constantinople and Salonica, which will have a special interest at the present moment, is followed by an account of Italo-Byzantine work at Ravenna and in the Exarchate, and of the Romanesque styles of Germany, France, and England.

At the time of his death, Mr. Andrew Lang was preparing for the press a book entitled "Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown." In this he combats the hypothesis that Bacon was the author of the poems and plays usually ascribed to Shakespeare, and also the other hypothesis that the writer was some distinguished person unknown. Mr. Lang believes he has been able to demonstrate "that neither Bacon nor Bungay, but William Shakespeare, of Stratford-on-Avon, was the unassisted author of the plays ascribed to him." Messrs. Longmans & Co. are the publishers.

"CARDINAL MANNING AND OTHER ESSAYS" is the title of a new book by Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, announced by Messrs. Longmans & Co. These essays are founded on the lectures delivered by Mr. Bodley at the Royal Institution in 1911. The subjects are Cardinal Manning, The Decay of Idealism in France, and the French Institute. The first essay will be illustrated by a reproduction of a portrait of the Cardinal painted for Mr. Bodley just before the Cardinal's death, and quite unknown.

"THE OXFORD BOOK OF VICTORIAN VERSE," chosen and edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, will be published at the end of this month by the Oxford University Press. Poems which adorned "The Oxford Book of English Verse (1250-1900)" have not been excluded from the new anthology; otherwise the editor, as he says, would have condemned himself to anthologising the second-rate and clearing the ground for an "Oxford Book of the Worst Poetry." The forthcoming collection, which begins with Landor and ends with Abercrombie, will be uniform with the other volumes of the Oxford series.

ARRANGEMENTS have just been made for the Oxford and Cambridge Review to be published in future by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, who inform us that the December number will be ready on Tuesday next, the 26th inst.

LOVERS of animals will welcome the "Animal Lovers' Calendar," 1913. The cover has a design by a well-known artist, and is printed in colours, while the inside of the booklet, composed of 32 pages, contains many attractive pictures of animals and a calendar for each month of the year, with appropriate quotations. It is published at 4d. a copy, or 3s. per dozen post free, at the "Animals' Guardian" offices, 22a, Regent-street, London, S.W.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

KING PIPPIN.*

ST. LUKE's summer, indeed! And what a glorious morning he has brought us again. King Pippin has chosen well to hold his last court of the year in his orchard. This has been his practice ever since he ascended the throne on that memorable autumn day many years ago, when he was loyally acclaimed King of the Apples and Quinces.

'Tis a pretty scene. The grass is still moist with the heavy dew that has not yet ascended into the sky which has opened like one vast Speedwell. The creeper on the castle wall is a curtain of intensest red, so bright in the clear sunshine that it seems to burn. A touch of frost has struck terror into the dahlias and reduced the flowers to a border of Clarkia, still very happy in purple and pink and white, some lavender bushes whose colour and perfume are not yet washed out, and a line of tall hollyhocks and perennial sunflowers looking over the heads of the humbler plants. But if flowers are few leaves are still many, and every one of them has got out its brightest trappings for this festive occasion. Russet and green, crimson and gold are draped about every branch. It is King Pippin's ambition to make a grand show on this annual occasion, and never has he had a finer opportunity than this to attest his eye for splendour. The weavers of the glistening braid and fine cloth of the leafage have been busy from morn till night. The king has drawn into his service the greatest decorative artists in the world, whose masterpieces of carving and moulding and colouring are here exhibited; while the distillers of exquisite perfumes and flavours add the last refinements to the charms of the ensuing banquet.

On the green carpet of the orchard the Court is assembled. The fine ladies must not mind getting their shoes wet, for the diamond drops are still on the shaded patches of clover. His Majesty is seated on a spacious rustic throne appropriately festooned with leaves of many hues. He is wearing a silken vest of pale canary, over which is thrown a light lacey cloak of red material with ribbons of the same. His consort, a lady of truly queenly presence, is seated near him, tastefully attired in pale green and primrose, with rosy trimmings.

Amongst the dames present is the Princess Annie Elizabeth, a monstrous portly matron who is extremely sensitive to draughts, and therefore delighted to-day because the atmosphere is so calm. Her bright red gown is almost hidden by a dark ruby mantle. Here are two maids-of-honour, the winsome Beauty of Bath and her spry little rival from over the water, all white and rose pink, who is known at Court as the Irish Peach. The Duchess of Oldenburg affects gay stripes, an Oriental style that becomes her bold Russian figure, while Lady Sudeley smiles in her primrose gown and pink ribbons.

Prince Bismarck, who, since he retired from the service of the Fatherland has accepted office as Earl Marshal under King Pippin, in which function his manners have greatly improved, shines in a dazzling military costume which on his gigantic frame is exhibited to full advantage. Green or saffron are supposed to be the ground colours for Court dresses, and some of the company appear in plain garments of one or other of these. Thus Lord Grosvenor and Lord Suffield, two brother peers, descended from the ancient family of the Codlins of Keswick, wear tightly fitting pale yellow suits without a particle of decoration of any kind. They look exceedingly neat. They are both most agreeable gentlemen, with none of that arrogance or aloofness which is supposed to characterise their class. Indeed, the delightful homeliness and simplicity of the Sovereign and his family has happily infected the whole Court, so that there is a childlike frankness about the most imposing ceremony. Old General Quarrenden of Devonshire, although he professes to wear green hose in honour of the Irish descent of his grandmother, will allow no colour to be visible about his person save dark maroon. Mr. Greening, a solid north-countryman, who is Minister of Education, dresses in a style in keeping with his reliable character, namely, in plain forester's green, with claret-coloured facings. Lord Chief Justice Gascoigne is present, of course, in the full glory of his scarlet robes. To look at him on such an occasion you would never dream what a tender-lipped and gentle-natured creature he is—"sweet as sugar," I heard someone say. Indeed, there are those who ridiculed the appointment of such a mild-spirited person to the chief seat on the Criminal Bench. Baron Pearmain, of Worcester, is enveloped in crimson. This handsome and egregiously popular person is somewhat superficial in character. He is fond of money and has amassed a large fortune, which was his principal title to a peerage.

It is a common custom in the Court of King Pippin to assume the name or title of some historic celebrity. Thus I was introduced to an affable little fellow who kept me laughing, who has the absurd fancy, not to say impertinence, to style himself "Mr. Gladstone." He has none of the profound and magnificent elements which belonged to that great statesman, and in one respect only can pretend to a likeness—he is a very early riser, and may be seen abroad and down in the market even before Dr. Ecklinville himself, Physician to His Majesty's Household, who invariably greets you with "Early to bed, early to rise," &c. None of King Pippin's subjects can sustain the reputation of an orator. The Sovereign himself is a man of few words and much laughter, and his example is followed throughout the Court.

That mellow old man on the fringe of the crowd, dressed in homespun russet, is the famous Ribston, the King's head gardener. Beside him is his Scotch assistant, Charles Ross, son-in-law to Chancellor Peasgood, that huge man standing to the left of the Queen. Conspicuous by their valour and other excellent qualities in the service of the Orchard State are Prince Albert, the Duke of Blenheim, a jolly old soul famous for good cheer at Christmas; the Prince of Orange, an energetic and deservedly popular officer; Captain Allington, D.S.O., and that sturdy bulldog Admiral Sturmer, O.M. (Order of Merit), who has never been known to budge either in battle or argument; while the jovial Irishman in shining brass breastplate and scarlet feathers sustains the hereditary title of the King o' Tompkin's Country. Just look at that tall Grenadier! He might be made of painted wax. Big Tom Putt, with his red face, is the King's trumpeter, and that official yonder in pea-green is the Keeper of Stirling Castle. To name but one more in the splendid crowd, let it be the massive and rubicund Royal chef, Sir Bramley Seedling, "Knight of the Kitchen," as he is familiarly styled, for who knows the inside of a good apple tart better than he?

But hark! See big Tom Putt is blowing his bugle. Silence falls upon the Court, the King rises and addresses his people for the improvement of their minds in the following homely verses:—

'Tis said when Adam planted first
An orchard, ere the ground was cursed,
He told the crab-trees in the wood,
Which apples bore both sour and small
And very often none at all,
To yield him fruit both sound and good.
The crabs knew not their duty clear
Nor what it was they had to bear;
They sprang to leaf, and pink-tipp'd flower
Spread o'er their branches like a shower.
All this was as the grasses grow
And as the whispering breezes blow;
It needs must be, nor otherwise
The rain may fall, the sap may rise;
But fruit as Adam sought was new,
And scarce the trees knew what to do.
Was't food he needed, juice for wine,
As meat and milk men get from kine?
But others made a finer guess,
They thought he wanted loveliness.
"Let's deck our boughs with stars and bells,
Let's mould our fruit like hearts and shells."

The controversy rose and fell,
Which way 'twould turn no one could tell.

To end dispute they sought the sun
And asked him how it should be done.
Were they to make some dumpling food,
Or sought the man a vision good?
Quoth Sol: The riddle that you ask
For me is none too great a task.
To me each day the duty brings
To warm and light all living things.
It might be done with stoves and lamps,
Dispelling thus the darks and damp;
But dull and dreary were such work,
Scarce worthy of a barbarous Turk;
So, as I ravel out my story,
I do it with the utmost glory;
I fill the mouth, I cheer the heart,
Body and spirit prove my art;
You then shall find a type in me
The lord of man and flower and tree.
Before this night I seek my bed
And 'neath the earth lay down my head,
Turn and behold my fervent face
And see the image ye must trace.

That eve the trees turned to the West
And watched the sun sink to his rest;
Slowly descending to the hill,
His beams the boundless heavens fill;
His countenance so ruddy bright
A world of wonder and of might.
The trees immediate clapp'd their hands,
For every sapling understands,
They feel within from twig to root
The figure of the perfect fruit.
The thorny crab in Eden's waste
So hard and bitter to the taste.
Submissive to the lordly sun

Finds need and loveliness are one.
The apple grows in beauty still Obedient to the industrious will,
To feast the child, to feed the man;
Yet higher trace the heavenly plan;
Its bounty glows an orb of light,
It laughs with joy, a vision bright.

King Pippin paused: The problem now
Is plain as day itself, I trow;
For use and beauty, as we see,
A perfect harmony should be.

THE FIRST LINDSEY HALL LECTURE.

DR. L. P. JACKS ON "RELIGION AS BASED ON THE NEED OF SALVATION."

DR. JACKS, Editor of the Hibbert Journal, delivered the first of the Lindsey Hall lectures at Lindsey Hall (Essex Church), The Mall, Notting-hill-gate, on November 14. The Rev. F. K. Freeston, presiding, briefly indicated the aim of the series of lectures. They are intended to deepen thought and to strengthen faith, to provide constructive contributions to theological discussion, and are offered, not in any controversial spirit, but in the spirit which has so acceptably characterised the Hibbert Journal from its inception; it was therefore appropriate that the first of the series should be delivered by Dr. Jacks.

Dr. Jacks, at the outset of his lecture, quoted the Ninth Article of the Church of England: "Man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit; and therefore in every person born into the world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." He believed that the general dissent from this statement is connected rather with the precise form given to the idea than with the broad essence of the idea itself. There is something in human nature which makes the highest and best difficult of attainment; we are slow and very confused in our apprehension of the Good. Slow to see our highest good, we are still slower to close with it; and even when we have closed with it our continued loyalty remains in peril, so that the risk of non-attainment of the ideal is always formidable. However we define the ideal, we all agree that there is a danger of its non-attainment.

We must all of us candidly admit that the finding of our ideal was no easy matter; that it requires vigilance and prayer to maintain our loyalty to the chosen ideal. And those who try to implant ideals in the life of society share the lot of the prophets. The world is hard to convince. The work of Jesus, of Paul, of Socrates, of Gotama, to say nothing of those nearer our own time, was extremely arduous, and sometimes heartbreaking and tragic. Everywhere they found themselves in the presence of stiff-necked and stubborn men. It is here that we get behind the letter of the Ninth Article, and there is a remarkable concurrence of testimony between the historical religions on the one hand and the modern spirit on the other. A broad view of what is involved in the most active idealism of our time shows us that the urgency with which our various ideals are preached only serves to reveal the desperate nature of the situation they are intended to retrieve. The human race, it is on all sides declared, needs saving from ruin. The alternatives are no longer those of a theological heaven and a theological hell, but they are still the alternatives of life and death; and the call to choose between them springs from a sense of danger not less vivid than, and certainly as well grounded as, that which inspired the preaching of St. Paul, or Savonarola, or John Wesley. It is doubtful if man's indictment of himself was ever so heavy, and yet so poignant, as it is to-day. The lecturer went on to show that the charges which Tolstoi, or Ruskin, or Ibsen, has brought up against the modern world make a blacker sheet than the theory of human nature involved in the Ninth Article. Who has set himself the heavier task—the evangelist who would redeem mankind from the primal curse by preaching the Atonement of the Cross, or the modern idealist who, with Ibsen's views of society, or with Carlyle's low opinion of human intelligence, undertakes our reformation by problem plays or by writing books on the Philosophy of Life? Mr. Bernard Shaw's condemnation of men as they now are amounts to something far more sweeping, more radical, more lurid than the worst construction put upon human nature by Luther, Calvin, or John Knox.

A fact which is very readily overlooked is that every form of religion presupposes the human race, or that portion of the human race to which it is addressed, to be in a highly critical condition. Whenever religion is truly alive you will find that a crisis is being faced and a desperate situation is being attacked. Nothing short of the contrast between utter defeat and crowning victory can measure the difference which religion, no matter what its form may be, proposes to effect in human life. Its aim is to save men from perishing, and for that reason it is not coterminous with social reform. No state of social improvement is so complete that men would not still stand in need of the salvation which religion tries to effect.

The appreciation of this fact brings us to a clearer conception of that sense of neediness in man to which all forms of religion bear witness. Assuming that there is some Highest Good which marks the true end of man, then every religion bears witness to this truth—that the natural man, left to himself, unhelped, undelivered, unredeemed by Saving Power of one kind or another, will undoubtedly fail in the attainment of that Good, and in that sense make shipwreck of his soul. This it is that makes the prophet's message "a burden of the Lord." Buddhism, in the form it took in Southern India, struck this note of urgency. Man's nature is a compact of desires, every one of which is leading him away from his goal. Salvation is to be won by ceasing to desire anything whatsoever. Christianity, while speaking a different language, is also under no illusions as to the vast predominance in the natural man of the forces which threaten his soul. If we eliminate from St. Paul's view all that mankind may hope for from the saving help of God, there is not a doubt that man, so bereft, is, to his thinking, in an utterly lost and hopeless condition. The teaching of Jesus is more difficult to deal with, but, with all his trust in human nature, he was no less keenly alive than any of his followers have been to the extreme peril of the natural man. "Many are called, but few are chosen." "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth to life, and few there be that find it." It was not to avert a petty crisis that he gave his life as a ransom for many, and poured out his soul unto death. It was to cause a reduction in fundamental tendencies which had gone astray, and so avert a crushing catastrophe. No agony was too extreme as the price to be paid for retrieving the situation.

Turning to the times in which we live, Dr. Jacks reminded his audience that, whatever may be the ideal offered to the world, whatever its colour and form, the inevitable consequence of proposing it to man is that the idealist is confronted by a general inability of man to see that it is the ideal, by general reluctance to accept it, and by a great danger that even if accepted it may never be attained. Whether we speak of the ideals of individuals who have preached gospels to us, such as Carlyle, Ruskin, Tolstoi, Matthew Arnold, and Mr. Bernard Shaw, or of those of movements such as Socialism, Eugenism, or even Vegetarianism, we find that, differing as they do from the ideals of the historical religions, and differing even more widely among themselves, they all concur in regarding the mass of mankind as in a state of extreme neediness and peril. Nothing short of a total conversion of habit will save us from an impending catastrophe. All bid us flee from the wrath to come. They are preached under the same fundamental conditions as faced Jesus, Socrates, Paul, Buddha—on the one hand, a broad way crowded by a multitude rushing to death; and, on the other, a narrow way leading to life which is hard to find, and when found still harder to keep.

Dr. Jacks proceeded to consider several examples of these generalisations, referring to Carlyle's estimate of the "thirty million persons, mostly fools," who inhabit these islands, Matthew Arnold's broad way of Philistinism and narrow way of Culture; and Mr. Bernard Shaw's stern denunciation of our economic, eugenic, and conventional sins of insincerity, ignorance, and illusion. He indicated in each case that the evangel of each of these prophets needs the power of God, for, on the showing of Carlyle, Arnold, and Shaw alike, the great mass of people is so far sunk in perdition that those who hear their gospels can never be intelligent enough to learn the lessons they are trying to teach. His object, Dr. Jacks said, was not to criticise the teaching of these idealists, but to bring to light the formidable paradox that every such idealist, standing in the light of his own ideal, finds himself compelled, sooner or later, to pass judgment on the darkness of his fellow men. Each of them becomes involved in an indictment of society which, if it were true, or wholly true, would condemn his own ideal to sterility. Each declares society to be under a curse, that of "chimeras," that of Philistinism, or that of insincerity. How is the curse to be removed? Those who are blinded by the curse are impotent. One said, "I am come to call not the righteous, but the sinners to repentance." But these modern preachers find the sinner in the outer darkness and leave him there.

Turning to the more intimate witness of our own self-knowledge, the lecturer declared his belief that there is within us all that which indicates not only the need of deliverance, but the mode by which we are delivered. This belief he expressed in the words of Professor Royce, and the concluding portion of the lecture was an exposition of what Royce has so finely stated:—"Without intense, intimate personal feeling you can never learn any valuable truths about life, about its ideals, about its problems; but on the other hand, what you know only through your feelings is unstable—like the passing hour, doomed to pass away. . . We are the creatures of transient feelings and wilful longings. But just because of this fact we get an insight, as intimate as it is fragmentary, into one absolutely valuable ideal. It is the ideal that the region of caprice ought to be ended, that the wounds of the spirit ought to be healed. In the midst of our caprices, yes, because of our caprices, we learn the value of spiritual unity and self-possession. And because this need is primary and this ideal far off from the natural man, we need salvation. Unless in moments of illumination you have seemed to feel the presence of your Deliverer, unless it has sometimes seemed to you that the way to the homeland of the spirit was opened to your sight, the way to a higher growth will be slow and uncertain to you." Royce, in these words, points out first that our self-knowledge seems to concur in that sentence of condemnation which historical religion and modern idealism have already concurred in passing on human nature. But, further, the other half of the truth is there too. We have had a depressing glimpse of something in our nature which baulks the spirit at every point; in one flash we seem to see our need of salvation and our inability to save ourselves. But is no importance to be attached to the fact that we have discovered all this? A mind utterly dark and ignorant could never be stung and ashamed by the knowledge of its darkness and ignorance. The gap is bridged. The ideal of which we are in search is in no distant heaven beyond the flight of our earth-bound spirits; it is living within us; it is the source of the condemnation we are passing upon ourselves. If folly, ignorance, falsehood are being dragged from their concealments and exposed to view with a freedom never known before, until it seems that there is no end to this ever-accumulating indictment against human nature, one reason and one reason only explains this most remarkable characteristic of our time. All this has become possible to our age because the light of the ideal, which alone can render evil visible, is burning in the world with a brighter light, casting its beams over a wider range of facts and penetrating more deeply into the meaning of human life. Our profound sense of the world's need becomes a witness to the redeeming principle within us.

AMERICAN QUAKERS AND A CREED

THE American Society of Friends has recently arrived at an interesting and important decision. Every five years the American Friends hold a large Conference, and the 1912 meeting was held a short time ago in Indiana. In consequence of a strong wave of Evangelicalism in the sixties of last century, the Quakers in the Middle and Western States adopted what seems to English Quakers an attitude and a discipline opposed to Quakerism—strongly defined Evangelical doctrine and the pastoral system. There has sprung up in America (influenced by the similar movement in England) a reaction among the younger Friends towards the primitive position of Quakerism, influenced also by intellectual criticism. The great question at issue at this Conference was whether a Declaration of Faith, approved by the Conference of 1902, should be confirmed. The final decision was that this Declaration and the letter of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes (referred to in the Declaration) were "historic statements of belief approved by the Five Years Meeting in 1902, and approved again at this time, but they are not to be regarded as constituting a creed." Dr. Rufus Jones writes in The American Friend: "There were moments of great tension while the conclusion was being reached"—it is, of course, the custom for the clerk of the meeting to take the sense of the meeting, and no vote is taken—"but there was at no time any sign of rupture nor any tone of bitterness, and as soon as the minute was passed, and the matter was settled, a tide of thanksgiving spread over the meeting, and a new spirit of unity was born which steadily grew until the meeting ended."

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED. THE INQUIRER FUND.

MISS DENDY, hon. secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded, acknowledges a contribution to our Fund of £10 from Miss M. C. Martineau. Amount already acknowledged, £198 7s. 6d.

Next Sunday (7.30 p.m.) will see an experiment in the way of Sacred Festivals at Crosby Hall, Beaufort-street, Chelsea, which is under the wardenship of Professor Patrick Geddes. A specially trained choir and a solo voice (Miss Evelyn Farman) will give chorales illustrating "The Harvest Seen and Unseen," commemorating not only the fruits of the earth, but also the harvest of pioneer work done in countless fields by those who have "gone before." The address will be given by Miss Alice M. Buckton. Children (both boys and girls) have their part in the simple pageant, bringing with them symbols—milk and honey, bread, oil and wine. They collect also the gifts "in coin and kind" brought by the congregation for the brightening of the inmates of the Children's Hospitals, and the Infirmary in Chelsea. Beautiful needlework has been lent by Miss Dorothea Hollins for the adornment of the Table of Offering, and a fine piece of painting in Tempera—a Madonna and Child, larger than life—has been lent for the next few Sundays by the artist, Miss Eveleen Buckton.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ballymoney.—The Rev. David Matts, of the Presbyterian Church (Non-Subscribing), who has been for over forty-four years a familiar figure in Ballymoney, has retired from the active duties of the ministry and taken up his residence at West Bromwich. Mr. Matts has gone away leaving many happy memories behind him, and his resignation is greatly regretted by the members of his late congregation. The church to which he ministered for so long came into existence as the result of the fierce theological controversy between the orthodox party and the Remonstrants in the Presbyterian Church. When the actual split came in 1830 several influential men in the district who were adherents of Dr. Montgomery, one of the most renowned of the Remonstrants, formed themselves into a body and built the church in Charles-street. The first minister remained only a short time, and was succeeded by the Rev. George Hill, who was appointed subsequently librarian of Queen's College, Belfast, in 1850. His successor was the Rev. Joseph McFadden, who established almost the first Intermediate school in the town, and was a zealous worker in the cause of temperance. The next minister was the Rev. William Napier, who left after three years to become the minister at Clough, County Down, and the Rev. David Matts succeeded him.

Billingshurst.—On Saturday evening, November 16, a lecture on "Egypt," illustrated by magic lantern views, was given in the Free Christian Church by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, of London.

Bury St. Edmunds.—The Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., president of the Eastern Union, preached at the Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday, November 17. Later on a social gathering was held in the schoolroom, Mr. Geo. Ward presiding.

Derby.—Mr. W. G. Wilkins, the new Mayor of Derby, is a member of the Friar Gate Chapel congregation.

Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross.—On Sunday last the Mayor of Hyde (Councillor Hinchcliffe Brooke), with members of the Corporation, and a large number of the public, attended divine worship at Hyde Chapel. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., conducted the service.

Kingswood School, Hallywood.—A very successful and elaborate concert and fairy play was given by the Kingswood Band of Hope and Guild in the above schools on Thursday and Friday last, November 14 and 15. These plays, as they have been produced now for four years, have done much to raise the purity of thought, artistic taste, and sense of beauty in the neighbourhood, and nothing could have exceeded the pleasure which ensued from this last venture.

Liscard.—A very successful sale of work, promoted by the Ladies' Work Society, in connection with the Memorial Church, was held on Saturday, November 9, in the church hall. Mr. John Fleetwood, the chairman of the church, presided, and introduced Lady Bowring, who opened the proceedings. The Rev. A. E. Parry and Sir William Bowring spoke.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The second of Dr. J. E. Odgers' lectures on "The History of the Unitarian Movement" was given at Essex Hall on Friday, November 15. The particular subject was "Anti-Trinitarianism and the Reformation," Dr. Odgers pointing out that the former term was older than the word "Unitarianism." Indeed, many of those who were commonly claimed as Unitarian martyrs would be considerably astonished to hear themselves so described. The principal personality dealt with in the lecture was that of Servetus, whose wonderful versatility and ingenuity of mind were described in some detail. The lecture concluded with references to the work of Francis David in Transylvania, and of the Socini. The next lecture will deal with "Unitarianism in England."

London: Muswell Hill.—The London District Unitarian Society recently arranged for a course of three expository lectures to be delivered at the Muswell Hill Athenæum on Wednesdays, beginning October 30. The lecturers have been the Revs. W. W. C. Pope, Henry Gow, and J. Arthur Pearson. The attendances have been 38, 34, and 20. After the last lecture there was a good show of hands in favour of further effort at this growing suburb. The names and addresses of a number of friends interested in the work has been collected, and they will be visited before the next effort is made. Thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a supply of valuable pamphlets and tracts have been circulated. The lectures have been definite and decided utterances on what Unitarians generally believe as to the Bible, God, and Salvation. After each lecture opportunity was offered and taken for questions upon the subject of the lectures, and upon other matters pertaining to Unitarianism. Ever since the Van Week at Muswell Hill there has been a spirited, but kindly, controversy in The Record. Muswell Hill offers a field for extension, and though the work will be hard, it should certainly be undertaken.

London: Stepney.—On November 17, Association Sunday, the Rev. G. Carter preached on the subject of "Definite Belief" at College Chapel. Mr. Carter has been out of active service for some months on account of eye trouble, and he received a warm welcome on his return to vigorous health.

London: Stratford.—An adult class has been formed in connection with the Unitarian Sunday school, which is open every Sunday at 3 p.m. to men and women. The object of the class is to afford unfettered discussion of topics relevant to religious and social matters, and to provide a centre for fellowship and the exchange of ideas. On Sunday, November 17, the speaker was the Rev. A. H. Biggs, of Ilford.

Manchester: Longsight.—The great undertaking which the Longsight congregation initiated some two years ago for the purpose of raising £1,250 was brought to a conclusion on Saturday, November 9, by a four days' bazaar, as advertised in these columns, and held in the Chorlton Town Hall. The total sum actually received from all sources, including donations from members of the church and Sunday school, former associates, and Unitarian friends throughout the country, together with proceeds from various efforts during that time, amounts to £1,220. To this must be added a considerable sum yet to come in from other sources, including generous donations from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, and it is hoped that after deducting the necessary expenses the net amount of £1,250 will be available. To all who have so generously contributed in any shape or form towards the realisation of this happy result, the congregation desire to offer their cordial thanks and to express their sincerest gratitude.

Mossley.—The annual sale of work in connection with Stamford-road Church was held in the schoolroom on Saturday, November 16, and proved a very successful affair. A number of old scholars, sons and daughters of men who began their association with the church when it was founded 60 years ago, were the principal speakers at the opening ceremony, which was performed by Mr. Albert Park, of Miles Platting, son of the late Mr. John Park. Mr. John Heap, eldest son of the late Mr. Joseph Heap, presided, supported by the Mayor of Mossley (Mr. William Lees, J.P.), Councillors J. E. Rhodes, George Beattie and Joseph Dennis, the Rev. H. Fisher Short (minister), Mrs. W. R. Ogden, Mrs. J. W. Wadsworth (treasurer), Mrs. Higginbottom, and others. The Mayor, in moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Park, said it was the seventeenth annual sale of work he had attended, and his interest in the event had not diminished. During the afternoon there were many visitors representing the different denominations in the town. The result of the day's efforts was £192. On Sunday, November 17, the Mayor, accompanied by the Corporation, attended service at the church. An appropriate order of service had been arranged by the minister, the Rev. H. F. Short, who also preached the sermon. The church was crowded, every available seat being occupied. The collection, which was in aid of the local charities, amounted to £12 12s.

Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire.—The Rev. John Hinkin, M.A., Congregationalist missionary, of 177, Lover's-lane, Atherton, Lancashire, has been granted a certificate of fitness to occupy a ministerial position in the Province by the Advisory Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire.

Sunday School Conferences.—On November 14 and 15, Sunday-school Conferences were held at Taunton and Bristol under the leadership of the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent. At the former a number of teachers from Ilminster, Bridgwater, and Cullompton were present. An organ recital was given to begin the proceedings in the re-decorated chapel by the organist, Mr. Short. When the conference was opened the Rev. John Birks gave a very hearty welcome to all friends. The Rev. T. Graham, Bristol, the newly appointed Sunday-school secretary for the Western Schools, followed with a brief address, in which he pointed out the difficulty of getting the teachers and helpers together at any one centre. An experiment was being made of holding district conferences, of which this was the first. Mr. Graham suggested that the four schools represented should form themselves into a local Union. The Rev. J. J. Wright, who brought the greetings of the Sunday School Association, introduced the subject of the conference, "The Difficulties and Possibilities of Sunday-school Work." Mr. Wright said that the work they were engaged in must be done hopefully. The noble band of teachers, unpaid and often unrecognised, almost equalled in number the combined forces of the army and the navy, for in England alone they were 700,000 strong. England was noted for its philanthropy, but the Sunday school was the biggest philanthropic and religious institution in the land. There were now seven and a half millions of Sunday-school scholars. There was something inspiring and helpful in this young life. Only one in four were said to attend the churches and chapels, but three out of four of the young people attended the Sunday schools. In the denomination which they represented there were 35,500 scholars, and more than 10,000 of these were over sixteen years of age, while the teachers numbered 3,500. The Revs. W. Holmshaw, T. Graham, J. Worthington, Mr. S. Goodland, Mr. Baggs, and others took part in the conference. At Bristol on the following evening the proceedings were very similar. The minister of Lewins Mead, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, briefly welcomed Mr. Wright, and the conference, in which Messrs. W. A. T. Price, C. Price, T. Gaylard, W. G. Fry, T. Graham, Miss Price, and Mrs. James took part, was of a helpful and encouraging character.

Wigan.—On Saturday, November 16, a farewell meeting was held in the Village Club, Bryn, when a presentation was made to the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, late minister of Park-lane Chapel, and Mrs. Higham, the gifts including a case of mathematical instruments and a reading stand. The chair was taken by Mr. Blundell, supported by Mr. Forshaw, of the Labour Council, Newton, and many friends from Park-lane, Ashton, and St. Helens, including Mr. E. S. Deakin, secretary. Mr. Higham, who is now minister of the Unitarian Church, St. Helens, was formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, and in responding to the kind expressions of affection and goodwill expressed by Mr. Blundell on behalf of the congregation, he gave a brief account of his experiences, first in Plymouth, then in country parishes in Lincolnshire and Bedfordshire, as chaplain to the Birmingham Corporation Waterworks, in Rhayader in Radnor, where he worked for six years among navvies, and at Wolverhampton. Seven years ago he began his ministry at Park-lane Chapel. The work proved too much for his strength, and he now proposes, while continuing his ministry at St. Helens, to devote his attention chiefly to mathematical studies.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual report of the American Unitarian Association just received records a year of satisfactory work, and the acknowledgment of the largest receipts that it has ever received in a single year. Every pledge has been promptly met, every bill paid, and at a time when all institutions and societies that depend upon the liberality of public-spirited people are experiencing great difficulty in meeting their expenses, the Association is able to carry on its work without any curtailment and unburdened by debt. There are, however, discouraging elements which cause some anxiety in America as in England, and they may be traced, it would appear, largely to the same causes. Social conditions, the vulgarising tendencies of the age, and the incessant pursuit of pleasure present insuperable obstacles to the progress of religious work, and there is the further difficulty that although the opportunities for church extension are practically limitless, there is a great dearth of men and women with the pioneering spirit who are able, willing, and free to take charge of new churches. If there are no leaders the people cannot be led, and it is not easy to see how this crying need of our time is to be met. The report of the Department of Social and Public Service contains some interesting facts, and there are many indications that the churches are seeking to emerge from the narrow groove of local and denominational interests in which they were formerly content to work. "One after another the churches are accepting the burden of social obligation, and are studying how they can best discharge these unaccustomed duties." There is not at present enough community of action, but suggestions have been made for the purpose of preventing the new movement from expending itself aimlessly, and the Department is anxious to give all the help it can in organising the churches for social service work, which is the outward and visible expression of the religious spirit.

SARAH GRAND AND MODERN NOVELS.

Madame Sarah Grand has some sad things to say about the reading public in an article in the Daily Citizen on "The Influence of Books." Hundreds of thousands of people, she reminds us, come under no other influence so continuously as that of the sensational writer of fiction, and she deplores the way in which books, though well written, that have some good purpose or aim are effectively "damned with faint praise" by many of the critics who act as guides in these matters. Most of us know how useless it is to seek in the majority of modern novels—the novels, that is to say, which form two-thirds of those in high favour at the subscription libraries—for nourishing and stimulating food for the mind. Madame Grand says she recently read twenty-nine of these books running, and in none of them did she find a thought or a phrase worth remembering, "nothing but the bald and more or less mystifying story. There was never a suggestion in the conversations that the characters cared for anything abstract or world-wide. All their interests were parochial, and their own little concerns absorbed them. They were just as boring as they would have been in everyday life. In not one of these novels was there a word of comfort, or anything to expand the heart, but there was a great deal to corrupt in the way that unprincipled conduct was endorsed." We believe that in spite of all this the taste for good literature is steadily increasing, but the process of educating the public mind must needs be slow in an age characterised by an inordinate craving for vapid pleasures, and more or less sensational accounts of the doings of vapid people.

SCHOOL PLAYGROUNDS.

The report recently published of a Departmental Committee which has been inquiring into the subject of play and playgrounds for elementary school children deals in a very sympathetic way with the disadvantages from which teachers and scholars alike suffer owing to the need for larger and better-equipped playgrounds. In the congested districts of our great towns especially, it is most desirable that the children should have all the benefits of the physical and ethical training which games can give, and in this respect the elementary schools are obviously much worse off than the secondary schools. If, however, large playing-fields are not available, bigger and better playgrounds should be provided in the case of new schools, giving twenty square feet for each older child and sixteen feet for each infant, and it is recommended that existing playgrounds of less than ten square feet for each child shall, after a certain number of years, be closed as "insufficient." It is further suggested that a roof playground should be accepted for the children of one floor if it covers the whole of the building.

MASQUES OF LEARNING.

Professor Patrick Geddes thinks that the pageant which has become so popular in recent years, although admirable in its way, too often presents only the conventional side of history as a record of the doings of exalted persons. For this reason he is introducing the "masque of learning," which is to deal with every branch of human culture, invention and discovery—in short, with whatever is human. The two masques performed by the Edinburgh Masquers on Thursday illustrated his new method, and were divided into scenes representing ancient, mediæval, and modern learning. The idea is an excellent one, and if it is extensively adopted it ought to do much to foster a feeling of pride in the achievements of mankind, and give colour and vitality to the ideal of citizenship.

THE AUSTRALIAN POPULATION.

From statistics recently published in regard to the population of Australia, it appears that during last year the increase was the largest for any year yet recorded, the number of births over deaths totalling 74,321, and an excess of arrivals over departures amounting to 69,300. The rate of infantile mortality for the same period was the lowest on record, the deaths under one year of age representing 68.49 per 1,000 births as against 74.81 per 1,000 in 1910. The Commonwealth is not likely to be troubled with a superfluity of women yet awhile, as there is a preponderance of men (the population comprised 108 males for every 100 females on a certain date in 1911), and the marriage registrations for last year constitute another record, numbering 39,482.

THE GROWTH OF BOSTON.

"Romantic Old Boston" is rapidly becoming a memory and a tradition, for although the narrow streets still remain which have given it the reputation of being like an English town, the erection of huge stores, hotels, and warehouses have robbed the city of the Three Peaks of the old-world air which characterised it in the time of Garrison, Longfellow, and Oliver Wendell Holmes. From a consular report compiled by Mr. Leay, the British Consul-General for the district, we learn that the population rose in ten years (1900-1910) from 560,892 to 670,588. Metropolitan Boston has now a population of 1,423,429, and is the fourth city in the United States.

GREAT SLUMP IN STOCKS.

THE TURKISH-BALKAN TROUBLE AND HOW IT AFFECTS YOUR INCOME.

The now familiar newspaper headline, "Slump in Stocks," is giving great concern to investors and stockholders throughout the country. Capital values are becoming so depreciated that the matter is one almost of life and death to those who are dependent for their living on investments.

The Turkish-Balkan trouble, therefore, provides another reason why an annuity in the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, with its profitable and guaranteed return, should be substituted for the uncertain dividends and fluctuating values possessed nowadays by ordinary securities.

CERTAINTY OF AN ANNUITY.

If you have never considered an annuity, consider it now. A Sun Life of Canada annuity often accomplishes objects unattainable otherwise.

The person in receipt of a Sun Life of Canada annuity enjoys a regular income which cannot possibly be disturbed by war, and rumours of war, or any other cause.

Of equal importance to the absolute security of a Sun Life of Canada annuity is the fact that it provides a return two to five times greater than can be obtained through any so-called gilt-edged investment.

THE FOLLOWING EXAMPLES of annuities now being paid by the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada demonstrate the advantage of this form of investment over the ordinary methods.

A gentleman of 54, with a delicate wife, aged 49, and no children, buys an annuity of £800 a year, costing £10,100. This annuity is paid him as long as he lives, and, moreover, the Company guarantees that even if he should die to-morrow the payments will be continued for ten years. In order that the wife shall absolutely be provided for if she is still alive at the end of ten years, she has the privilege of paying another £1,500, and having the £800 yearly continued throughout the remainder of life.

Three sisters, aged 62, 69, and 72, deposit £1,500, and receive a joint annuity of £135, payable half-yearly, until the death of the last survivor.

A retired solicitor with impaired health, aged 74, deposits £6,000, and receives an annuity of £1,000, payable for life, thus increasing his income fourfold.

INVALIDS.

Very few companies grant better terms to an invalid than to a healthy person of the same age. The Sun Life of Canada grants a larger annuity according to the degree of impairment. For example, a lady, 59, was for £2,500 given an annuity of £750 (30 per cent.). The ordinary rate for a healthy female of that age is a little over 12 per cent.

PERFECT SECURITY.

Assets of over nine million pounds (£9,000,000), invested under Government supervision, and an undivided surplus of over one million pounds (£1,000,000) are sufficient proof of the absolute safety and strength of the Sun Life Assurance of Canada. In fact, no Assurance concern in the world is in a stronger and better position than this Company. Why not investigate its annuity propositions for yourself? It will give you little trouble and no expense to find out how a Sun Life of Canada Annuity will benefit your particular case. And there is a Sun Life of Canada Annuity for every contingency—yourself, your wife and yourself, your son, your daughter.

Write to-day, giving age, amount to be invested, and the form of provision you wish to make, and we will send you full details. Address: J. F. Junkin, Manager, SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA, 131, Canada House, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE past week has been the most uneventful since the beginning of the war in the Balkans. There has been constant talk of tension in the newspapers and a fair crop of alarmist paragraphs ; but these may probably be discounted as concessions to the public demand for news and the rooted dislike of the publicist to acknowledge his ignorance. Perhaps the wisest comment on the situation is contained in the following remarks of an Ambassador in London to Reuter's representative :—

“ The removal, in a period of five weeks, of a situation that has existed for five centuries must necessarily involve the discussion of an immense number of questions between the Powers.

“ One hears much of the Austro-Servian affair, but this is only one of many, and will no doubt be settled in due course, but it should not occasion surprise if the discussion of all these questions occupies a long time, and even causes periods of tension. It would, indeed, be curious if it were not so.

“ But, notwithstanding all that is said to the contrary, the Powers are working together for peace. All of them would look upon war as insane and criminal ; nobody wants it.”

THE spelter (zinc smelting) workers at Swansea are able to appeal to organised religious sentiment as well as to the less articulate demand for social justice in their strike against Sunday labour. It is stated that at present these men work seven days a week and an average of ten hours every day. This would be an outrageous state of things even in a healthy form of employment like agriculture, but it is notorious that this particular kind of work is fraught with grave physical risk. An industry which has blasted a fair country-side cannot kill vegetation and leave men untouched. The whole situation supplies a strong argument for the scheduling of dangerous trades and their control by a regular system of inspection. With the lives of men at stake and their inalienable right to a share in the privileges and happiness of a civilised community, the abstract plea of the economist for non-interference is of no avail and simply reveals his bankruptcy in the science of right living.

THE following opinion of a Swansea doctor, quoted in the Daily Citizen, puts the physical and moral issues of the struggle in a nutshell :—

“ Disregarding the religious side of the question altogether,” he says, “ there is not the slightest doubt that if the men get what they are asking for, they will be greatly benefited. Being able to get some fresh air once a week, their lives will be lengthened. I can assure you that speltermen are more often in the doctor's hands than other workers. The system of every one of them is more or less affected by lead-poisoning, and with a periodical rest they would be better able to fight against this great evil. It must not be forgotten that there is a secondary evil which affects the wives and children as well as the men. Constant toil in the spelter works creates an unnatural craving for strong drink. If the men give way to this they are more easily knocked over by the lead. Experience has proved this, and although the average spelterman is remarkably steady, it is a wonder they are not all confirmed drunkards, as many men would be if they worked in the same atmosphere.”

THE proposal to abolish the restrictions which confine the Divinity degrees at Cambridge to members of the Church of England was carried last week by the substantial majority of 109—435 votes to 326. The decision marks another step forward in the slow process of removing theological tests from the path of learning. It will probably be more difficult to open the Divinity professorships in the same way as they are associated very closely with a venerable ecclesiastical tradition, but it is a change which is involved logically in the present decision and cannot be delayed much longer.

THE discussion on the subject revealed a good many cross-currents of opinion. Dr. Neville Figgis, for instance, advocated the change on the ground that it would help to remove the false impression that a doctorate in divinity is a guarantee of theological wisdom.

“ If the change be made,” he writes in a letter to the Times, “ the doctorate will be without any presuppositions at all, and a recognition for learning on the topic of religion considered as a human phenomenon. This being so, there can be no ground for confining it to Christianity, and the degree ought to be equally obtainable for an exercise on Confucius or Buddha, without any reference at all to the Christian Church.

“ Once this change is accomplished we shall cease to be in a false position in the matter, and I am willing to accept its obvious corollaries. Possibly, though not probably, it may have some slight effect in inducing the leaders of the theological school to devote more attention to the fundamental problems of belief instead of their existing immersion in critical and linguistic studies, which are only by courtesy to be called theology.”

THE complimentary dinner, which was given to Canon Lilley last week by a large group of his friends in London, was carefully guarded from the intrusion of reporters. It was a wise provision in the interest of the intimacies of friendship. Here we may say that the speaking was of a high order and had in it a personal note, which is often chilled into silence in a more public atmosphere. It was a very remarkable gathering, and will long remain with those who were present as a gracious memory. The tribute of affection was also a debt of honour to one who has had the rare gift of drawing all sorts and conditions of men and women to himself and interpreting them to one another, and through the affectionate magnanimity of his own nature has made them conscious at all points of the deeper unities of the Spirit.

By the feeble expedient of "the previous question" the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury has once again revealed the inability of the clerical mind to face the realities of the modern world with courage. Last week the Dean of Westminster submitted a proposal to modify the implied belief in the verbal inspiration of the Bible in the service for the ordering of deacons. At present the question runs:—

Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament?

Answer: I do believe them.

The proposal submitted through the Dean of Westminster was as follows:—

Do you unfeignedly believe that the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament contain all things necessary to eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ?

Answer: I do so believe.

In the discussion the Dean of Norwich pointed out the serious difficulties which the present form of words creates for many earnest and conscientious minds, and Bishop Mitchinson went so far as to confess that he could not himself answer the question in the affirmative, and that he was glad that his age now prevented him from preparing candidates for Holy Orders.

MR. H. P. GREG gave a remarkably interesting address on the relations of employers and employed last Monday to a meeting of the Manchester Textile Society. His chief contention was that the one thing which more than any other was responsible for the industrial unrest of to-day was the substitution of limited liability companies for private ownerships and partnerships. In the old state the employer and employed often lived in close proximity, and there was a personal bond of human sympathy which was absent to-day, when the worker and his ultimate employer, the shareholder, knew and cared nothing about one another. The directors and managers, instead of forming a link between, acted too often as a buffer. A further effect of the system was to disclose the profits to the workers, who often viewed with envy the large sums divided amongst people who cared nothing for their welfare.

STRIKES Mr. Greg dismissed as bad for both sides and therefore as no remedy for misunderstanding, though he would never advise the employed under any conditions to give up their right to strike. He also put aside schemes of co-partnership and probably of profit-sharing, as being excellent ideals but not likely to be realised in this generation. In his view the best thing that could be done to-day was to remove misunderstandings by bringing employer and employed once again into closer personal touch. It was doubtful, he thought, whether the employers had given enough care to the training of overlookers. That training must be practical, but it must be in the good management of men as well as of machinery. Mr. Greg concluded with the suggestion that in the opportunity of forming a works' society to be approved under the National Insurance Act, the employer had a new chance of coming into personal touch with the employed.

WE wrote a little doubtfully last week about the spiritual significance which "Artifex," of the Manchester Guardian, is inclined to attribute to religious associations of working-men in France and Germany. With his article this week, which deals with the value of "retreats" in the fussy and over-organized religious life of our own country, we are in the heartiest sympathy. The word "retreat" has an aroma of Catholic devotion about it which makes it distasteful to the Puritan mind. But it is the thing not the word which matters. The prayer-meeting of evangelical Nonconformity does not take its place or meet the same need, for the atmosphere of the prayer-meeting is often charged with self-consciousness or morbid excitement instead of the spirit of quietness and meditation. The real need is for spaces of quiet in suitable surroundings and under wise direction, where the ignoble strife of ordinary days and the endless discussions of the religious platform are forgotten, and thoughts of God and Christ, of holiness and peace, become the soul's natural habitude. There would be a strange access of confidence and power and ministering grace in the activities of religion, if we could only recover some of the deep primal wisdom of the words "Study to be quiet."

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

"IN THE MIDST OF THEM."

BY THE LATE REV. E. P. BARROW, M.A.

"Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."—MATT. xviii. 20.

A THOUGHTFUL writer has pointed out in a very striking way, that the present falling off in attendance at public worship, whatever other causes there may be, is chiefly due to this, that many men have lost their belief in the living Christ—the living Christ, as near, as accessible, as actually present in the congregation, as He was in the midst of His disciples in the scenes of His earthly ministry. This I take to be the root of the matter. The Christian Church, as a whole, has never abandoned the thought that Christ's abiding presence is still continued on earth. It is true that the thought has branched into two separate conceptions. The Catholic believes that his Lord is "truly, really, and substantially, though not perceptibly, present in the Holy Eucharist." Members of reformed churches believe that Christ is personally, though spiritually, present, and does impart real, though spiritual, gifts to His disciples. I believe myself that indifferent laymen are only trifling with the subject when they give this reason and that for their indifference—the monotony of the prayers, the dulness of the sermon, the pooriness of the music, the meanness of the architecture, and so on. The soul that is in earnest takes little note of externals. Let these same men be once absorbed in one thing, and they will at once forget everything else. It may be the price of cotton, it may be a political question, it may be a new scientific discovery, it may be the financial report of a public company. Are they so fastidiously critical, so sensitive, then? Do they stop to consider little points of order, the appearance of the speakers, their voice, their style, the details of the building in which they are assembled—Exchange, or Public Hall, or Lecture-room? Their minds are so carried away by the subject of interest—whatever it may be—that all these things are of little account, and are hardly observed. So would it be with worship; if the engrossing interest were there, they would overlook details. Why do they not say plainly that for them the power of the risen Christ simply does not exist, that they have never believed and never intend to believe, that, where two or three are gathered together in His name, there He is really and truly present in their midst. "To believe this is to believe a miracle." Undoubtedly. That is what the orthodox Christian believer does believe, and it makes all the difference. Spiritual communion with the Son, and with the Father through the Son, that, and nothing less, has been the central thought in Christian worship from the beginning until now. Do you suppose that if men believed seriously in such a possibility in such an opportunity, they would excuse themselves from acting upon them on such silly pretences as those which are now given? And do you not see what a vast distance there must be between the devoted and constant worshipper to whom worship is a self-presentation, a standing in a divine presence, an act of spiritual communion, and the casual church-goer, to whom church-going is a matter of formal observance, of little consequence, one way or another? This surely can hardly be the right construction, if there is any meaning in those words: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

At the same time the meaning is not easily defined, and it is quite possible that the common notion of the meaning may not be altogether right. Let us examine the verse more closely. "Where two or three are gathered together." "Two or three." This is the church, the assembly, the congregation, in its smallest and narrowest form. An individual cannot form a society, a communion; three, or even two, individuals can. And the spiritual presence does not depend on the extent of the congregation. The condition is not one of time, or place, or numbers. The time may be any time, the where anywhere, the numbers may be two thousand or three thousand, or twenty or thirty, or two or three. The real condition is a spiritual condition. "In" or "into," "my name." "Name" here, as elsewhere, means very much more than name, or title. It comes nearer to our word "character," that part of person, or being, which we know. To be gathered in the name of Christ is not simply to be called Christian, but to be drawn together to a point of union—that point of union being His character, His spiritual likeness, Himself so far as we are able to know Him. So then they who would have Christ with them must first have come under the power of His spirit. To be gathered under a denominational name—even His own—is nothing, for there is nothing in a name. There remains now the manifestation—"there am I in the midst of them." How are we to understand this? "In the midst." Three times it is said that Jesus after His resurrection "stood in the midst" of His disciples. What was the effect? They were "terrified and affrighted"; they were "troubled," and reasonings arose in their hearts. Suppose a local appearance like that were granted to us. If we were not terrified and affrighted, we should be troubled, and reasonings would certainly arise in our hearts. And what blessing, what spiritual benefit would come to us from such external presence? In what way would there be closer communion than before? Even that Presence of God in the House of Prayer, of which we sometimes speak—if it were only a presence "in our midst," what would it profit us? It is as a spiritual presence in the heart that God reveals Himself. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God"; and there is no other way of seeing God. We see Him only in so far as we are like Him, and are fitted and prepared by that likeness to enter into communion with Him. Similarly with the presence spoken of in our text, "There am I in the midst of them." A local presence would avail nothing. A spiritual presence must be spiritually received, and so perceived. This would mean that the spirit of Christ is never present in any congregation, great or small, unless, and except in so far as, His spirit reigns in the hearts and lives of the separate members. It is in His character in us, in His likeness in us, that He is in the midst of us—not as a group, or circle, but in the midst of us individually, in each separately, as a separate unit. If this be so, what a new idea is given to Christian worship! It is not an assembling of ourselves together to discharge a duty, to observe a custom, to hear good words (provided they be sufficiently striking) and to carry away good thoughts (provided they be not too disturbing), but a gathering together into an act of communion with God in the spirit, likeness, character of Jesus Christ. What a number of questions immediately suggest themselves! What is the end and aim of a congregation? To add to its numbers? To spread opinions? To cultivate tastes? To make social opportunities? To promote social intercourse? Is it even to offer up prayer and praise and thanksgiving? Or is it to deepen character, to strengthen habit, to form a likeness, to be possessed by a spirit? And may we not interpret our text in this simple way: Where men and women are Christ-like, there Christ is, and where they are not Christ-like, there Christ is not? Stone walls do not make a church, nor attractive services, but—to use an old phrase—the putting on of the new man, the amending of our private life, of our tempers and ways, of our action one towards another. Just as it is possible for one, so it is possible for two or three together, to be transformed by the Christ-life. Where the Christ-life is, there Christ is present. It is in this way that He desired to be present. "Touch me not," is His warning to those who would make His presence a corporal presence. He is satisfied to be present in spirit, not before the eyes, but in the inner lives of those who spiritually, and in the love of God and man, are one with Him. Just as a kindness done to one of His little ones was, He said, a kindness done to Him, so to look upon one another with His eyes is, in one another, to see Him. Let us bear this in mind. How often have we wished for some open manifestation of that beloved form! And yet what would come of it, even if He stood in our midst? Should we be near Him, unless in nature and character we approached Him?

When the two disciples journeyed to Emmaus, and Jesus, unknown to them, joined Himself to them, their hearts burned within them; presently He was known of them in the breaking of the bread, but when they tried to see Him of whom their hearts were full, He vanished out of their sight. So is it still. There is no open vision. Only by His spirit dominating us within, and bringing us into fellowship one with another, is Christ present with us. Something of this thought Keble expresses in the closing words of his lines for Easter-day:—

So is it still: to holy tears,
In lonely hours, Christ risen appears:
In social hours, who Christ would see,
Must turn all tasks to Charity.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

A VALUABLE and illuminating study of "The Nature of Woman" has just been published which will, we hope, be read by everyone who is interested in the Woman's Movement, more especially—and we say this advisedly—because the suffrage is not directly referred to throughout its pages.* It is beginning to dawn on the more thoughtful exponents of feminism that the whole subject of the relations of men and women and the value of their life and work in the world is much more complicated, and requires much more patient study than some of our light-hearted platform orators will admit. Its ramifications can be traced through all social forms, its roots go down to the foundations of the world, and, try as we may to evade them, the commands of nature laid upon women are so imperious and fundamental that the denial of them is fraught with peril both for the individual and the race. This is the point of view which Dr. Tayler, the author of the book, brings before us, and the impartial reader can have nothing but praise for the wise and sympathetic way in which he has treated a difficult and controversial subject to the discussion of which few people bring the scientific temper and knowledge that it requires. His conclusions may not be convincing to all; he himself does not regard them as absolutely final; but this makes us all the more anxious to follow the development of his ideas through the further volumes which we are promised on the life and nature of woman. They are the result of careful research by a trained mind, and we have had too much passionate rhetoric up to the present time, too many illogical demands for justice—as if justice were a sort of sugar-plum that Governments can bestow or withhold as they please. And it is plain to all who have eyes to see that in the vociferous agitation of recent years, Truth, that elusive and austere goddess in whose name so many curious rites are still performed, has been gradually withdrawing from the field of conflict where her counsels are often so recklessly ignored.

"The Nature of Woman" will not be liked by ardent supporters of the gynæcentric theory; it is quite possible that it will not be liked even by some who have never heard the name of Professor Lester F. Ward. A man cannot expect to be very popular in progressive circles to-day who lays stress on the fact of sex-differentiation, which nature is nevertheless favouring more and more; who arraigns the whole system of education, including co-education, from a standpoint which it is customary to consider old-fashioned; who holds that strenuous athletics are harmful and unsuitable for girls; who believes in the ideal of marriage and the home for all, and who is undoubtedly prepared to plead while he has breath in his body for the retention by women of all those essentially womanly qualities which really increase her dependence upon man, and make her most lovable in his eyes. But Dr. Tayler differs from certain aggressive anti-suffragists who share his sentiments but often express them crudely, in his profound respect for women, and his deep sense of the high calling to which they are destined as mothers of men. His reasoning is biological, but his argument takes us into a region beyond that of scientific logic where the higher intuitions that belong to woman, and which she should never seek to deny, are paramount. Those intuitions justify and reinforce the instinct for sacrifice and renunciation which is supremely characteristic of her, and must find its satisfaction, when she does not attain to wifehood and motherhood, in art, literature, and all forms of social service and unselfish activity for the uplifting of the human race if she is to retain her true individuality and act as a dynamic force in the world.

We are in absolute agreement with Dr. Tayler as to the true function of womanhood, and the lamentable results of sterilising the woman's sensitive nature in order that she may become a merely rational human being, fit to grapple with the problems and share in the work of the world, as we know it to-day, "like a man." But there are one or two considerations which always claim attention in discussing the adjustment of the feminine mind and temperament to modern conditions of life which we do not feel he has dealt with quite adequately and fairly. It is true that a deep and brooding discontent is characteristic of the Woman's Movement, but we scarcely think it is "without a satisfactory explanation" if it is taken in conjunction with man's discontent, the labour discontent—the world's discontent, in fact, of which it is merely a part. We believe it will ultimately be realised by all thoughtful people that there is no woman's movement distinct from man's, and that if one section of the community suffers any injustice this is the result of the chaotic ideas of government and the conduct of life which prevail throughout the community as a whole. And if we admit that the driving of women into offices and factories and commercial enterprises tends to physical deterioration, the suppression of the intuitional faculty and the hardening and coarsening of the whole nature in proportion as the combative instincts, so much more characteristic of man, are fostered in them, what practical remedy is to be found for these evils so long as hundreds of thousands of women in our country alone, many of them married and with children to support, have to wring a livelihood from a flinty-hearted world? "It is the study of what is consonant with the life of a true man and what with a true woman that will one day decide precisely what should be a man's field and what a woman's," says Dr. Tayler, adding, "It is not a matter for guess-work, not for the industrial employer to discover after he has ruined thousands and thousands of lives, but for the scientist who shall take up such an investigation in a large-spirited and high-minded manner." But is this possible until we have got over the initial difficulty of providing the great army of workers, who cannot wait for these investigations, with daily bread? One of the obvious reasons why many women are unmarried is because, owing to competition, the greater cost of living, and the increasing strain of the struggle for existence all round men nowadays marry much later in life—and this, in its turn, is not without its relation to the unhappy fact that thousands of women (30,000 in London alone, it is estimated) are permanently denied wifehood, motherhood, and an honourable position in society for the worst of all possible reasons. Dr. Tayler points out that the excess of women with which we are also confronted would not be as great as it is if we were wiser. "Boy babies are born in greater numbers than girl babies, and were women better mothers and men better fathers, the boy baby, more delicate than the girl baby, would not die to the same extent, and the proportion of the sexes would be equalised at maturity." But even then the balance would scarcely be redressed while the male population is so frequently decimated by dangerous occupations, colliery disasters, war, and the like. It is stated, for instance, that in the war between the Turks and the Balkan States nearly 150,000 men have fallen during three brief weeks' fighting on the side of the Allies alone, and nobody has yet estimated the Turkish losses. There is also another fact to be reckoned with which is just touched upon in this book—the growing disposition of women to apply a mental as well as a physical standard in choosing a husband, and to remain unwedded if they cannot find in marriage a realisation of their full individuality—a tendency all to the good both for their own advancement and that of the race. Finally we have to realise that women can no more be run all into one mould than men, and that civilisation seems to be tending in the direction of increasing differentiation between types as well as between sexes—between habits, tastes, ambitions and modes of self-expression which are not absolutely at the mercy of the physical organism and cannot always be satisfied in the quiet ways of domesticity.

"There are in the human mind a whole bundle of faculties," says Dr. Tayler, "not yet investigated or even faintly understood," and it may be that until we have learnt to study these more carefully, together with the absorbing and bewildering social problems of our time, we shall be unable to prophesy with any certainty what fruits the Woman's Movement will bring forth in days to come. We hope, however, earnestly and sincerely, that this book will stimulate fruitful discussion, that the noble ideals advocated in its pages will receive more support as time goes on, and that the conditions of society will permit women to return, before it is too late, "on a higher plane, with wider knowledge, to the old thought that is healthy and sane."

THE REPERTORY THEATRE IN LIVERPOOL.

THE Repertory Theatre in Liverpool is now an established fact. A meagre response from the monied public, a qualified enthusiasm from the artistic public (if there is one), pessimistic prophecy from the business circles which persist in regarding a repertory theatre as a commercial investment, rather puzzled and not too ecstatic interest from miscellaneous ranks of playgoers, uninformed and puerile criticism from numerous irresponsible amateur actors, have not prevented Liverpool from entering boldly into the new dramatic movement, and even holding its own in it. The Repertory Theatre is unfortunately being worked at a disadvantage in the matter of money. A man advances little in the idealistic direction when he is continually anxious about his daily bread; and the Repertory cannot yet, as it should, exist to live greatly, but is constantly pulled back into the necessity of living merely to exist. A strong plea lately made by Mr. Granville Barker for its endowment, if not municipal then private, seems ineffectual. "There might be a grant for the production of a Greek tragedy every year," said Mr. Barker, soaring into a dream-world beyond Liverpool commercialism, "or of a Shakespearean play; or a grant for the best new and original play of Lancashire life. Why should not there be endowed Fellowships of the theatre?" To that echo makes no reply, and the Repertory continues to try not to lose sight of the horizons in its enforced contemplation of financial facts.

With all its difficulties, however, it is slowly educating an audience appreciative of its changed atmosphere and ideals. Week after week the same faces are to be seen in it, roused to the interest of their own day and generation in this matter of the drama—in this art which of all the arts to-day can be truly declared renascent and alive. Already the older régime begins to seem very old. Even so recent a play as Pinero's "Iris," revived at the Repertory, had lost what grip of reality it once possessed. The luxurious viciousness of a contracted aristocratic world, the shams and conventions of fools' paradises, even the charming fantasies of Barrie are being brought to the bar of a new demand—a demand for reality—and found wanting. The point of view from which the drama was a mere titivation and ornament lightening the dull realism of life is of yesterday. It exists, of course, but it is of the things that have been rather than of the things that are becoming. "What a hideous play," said Clement Scott, when the new revolt voiced itself in "Hedda Gabler," "wherewith to lighten the sorrows and agonies of human life!" "Is that indeed life?" says the new playwright and the new critic, intolerant of old values and merciless to conventions—"Then it is a fitting subject for the drama. If it is real, if it is true, if it is human, it is fitting for the drama. It is fascinating, interesting, amusing, wonderful, astonishing—like all life. There are unseen forces behind it; let the drama suggest them. Life, all life, is crying to be understood through Art. It is striving for self-expression. Let the drama take its place as the great faculty of self-expression of this new age. The drama is not merely an escape from life; it is the habitation of the creative spirit inspired by life—the intense, immense, significant, multitudinous life of this very day.” Says Hauptmann as long ago as 1889 in his “Lonely Lives,” “I dedicate this drama to those who have lived it.” The quality, the mystery, the dignity, the ignobleness, the misery, the irony, the joy, the grotesqueness, the new rhythms of modern existence, all unlimited, unprecise, unfinished as they are, clamour to express themselves in this medium which daily assumes more importance; and the significant pens of the new corps are racing to give them utterance. They may do it realistically, like Galsworthy or Stanley Houghton; symbolically, like Maeterlinck; idealistically, like Gilbert Cannan—that fine mind among the younger men, who in showing us life shows us also something large and imaginative in the background of life; but all alike they are dedicating the new drama to those who are living it.

Whether any of these thoughts passed through the minds of those who sat watching “Hindle Wakes” at the Liverpool Repertory or not, the interest of it was as usual absorbing. The cry of “immoral” has not been heard, it seems, there. Two earnest playgoers sitting near the writer were exercised as to what the play was “meant to teach,” and what people were “meant to think” at the end. The modern drama is like that. It gives one “furiously” to think, but it does not tell one what to think. Consequently, many naïve and docile souls are left helplessly facing life and its problems as expressed there with no one to give them a helping hand towards correct opinions. That is like life too—puzzling, dangerous, tangled, mutinous, unfinished—but salutary.

BARBAROUS FORMS OF PUNISHMENT.

SIR,—Is not much of the righteous indignation which burns so fiercely at present directed upon the wrong people? Will not the rich men whose vice is the source of the whole infamous trade be strutting in high society in London, while their dupes are being flogged? No one proposes to touch their delicate aristocratic skins; and yet, so far as I can see, they are far worse than the men for whom they find employment. In the story of Copperfield, Littimer is a contemptible wretch; but he is not half as bad as the magnificent Steerforth. Till society comes to a Christian view of the whole question no ferocity will stop the trade, though it may lead to greater cunning. However, we must hope that the present outburst of wrath will tend to awaken a purer public opinion.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

18, Rawlinson-road, Oxford.

November 25, 1912:

SIR,—I am far from wishing to express an opinion as to the form of punishment most likely to intimidate the vile miscreants who seek to decoy young girls to their destruction, for I feel strongly, with your correspondent H. S. Salt, that public attention should be directed from that side of the question to the more vital one, viz., the cause of the evil.

The procurers, male and female, whom the Criminal Law Amendment Act will punish, are merely paid agents. One asks, where does the money come from? We read of 5,000 girls being wanted in one town. Who wants them? They must be wealthy people. One shudders to think of the abyss of corruption underlying society in the most highly civilised cities of Europe and America! These villains escape all punishment; they hide behind their hired accomplices. No village, railway station, town, is safe from them; fifty-two girls are missing from London this year!

The difficulty of safeguarding young women and girls lies in their profound ignorance of the dangers in their path, and their mothers are equally ignorant. They are easily won over by promises of high salaries and easy circumstances in far distant towns. The parents let the girls go, in many cases never to hear of them again.

In Switzerland no girl is allowed to enter a situation in a foreign town unless a satisfactory character of the employer has been obtained by the officer of the Information Bureau. The State takes more care of its girls in Switzerland than we do in England.

I have a growing hope that the virtuous men of England will arouse themselves, and that not one, but many St. Georges will arise determined to slay the Dragon, and make our country once more “A Merrie England,” where girls are safe, since men are pure.—Yours, &c.,

MARY L. BRUCE.

SIR,—I regret that my assumption was not warranted that you, in common with others who denounce flogging for the male procurer, are thrown back on penal servitude as the only available punishment. That being so, the situation of those who hold such a position seems to be you are averse to a sentence of penal servitude not only with, but even without, the addition of flogging. If this is the case, may I not still inquire: What, then, do you propose to do with the criminal in question?

In my letter last week I endeavoured to indicate how obtusely ineffective as either a remedial or a deterrent process is the existing system of imprisonment, as its liberal creation of recidivists sufficiently asserts. Flogging is seriously advocated as a necessary amendment to this impotent machinery in such an instance as that under review; but, at the same time, no more out of “mere hatred of the criminal,” as Mr. Salt declares, than the “humane” proposal arises out of connivance with the crime. Indeed, the introduction of the terms “barbarous” and “humanitarian” into the discussion is to be regretted. They are as inapt as in any brand of surgery. The lash, some penologists are of opinion, may, in certain moral exigencies, be as opportunely applied as, in other circumstances, the scalpel, and it is in this sense that the scourge is advocated here. It is dangerous to make a dogma even of the non-shedding of blood, since such a dogma confounds the mind in discriminating between the beneficence or cruelty of different actions in which it may be involved.

I agree with you, sir, that “punishment ought always to have some relation to the redemption of the criminal”; but I am not less firmly convinced that both wrath and pain are needed in the Divine economy to play their parts through us in the emancipation of the soul from sin; and to this end are the capacities to experience and to provoke both planted deeply and ineradicably within our hearts. At the same time, we are glad to recognise that growing wisdom and sympathy require that we should be increasingly exacting in the adjustment of the scope of their action. He who has awoke to the need of “celestial surgery” will say with R. L. Stevenson—

Lord, if too obdurate I,
Choose Thou, before that spirit die,
A piercing pain, a killing sin,
And to that dead heart run them in.

Yours, &c.,

Lyndhurst, Hants., H. M. LIVENS.

November 25, 1912.

SIR,—I should like, as a woman, to express my hearty concurrence in the views you have put forward on the subject of flogging. At a time when in our schools and families wise teachers and parents are relying less and less on the rod, as an instrument of discipline, it is disquieting to find society acclaiming its necessity in the case of grown men. The calculated resort to physical violence is one of the most serious dangers of our time, and if the community as a whole has nothing better to oppose to it than similar violence, then we are drifting into a backwater of civilisation from which it will take the strong pull of generations to come to rescue us. The equality of the sexes, too, which we have been thankful to feel was drawing nearer, is gravely compromised by this differentiation of punishment, and the assumption that a man can only be made to feel the hideousness of his wrongdoing by the lash. At the back of the whole miserable business of the White Slave Traffic are, of course, the twin evils of the selfishness of men and the poverty of women. The latter is now being realised by the conscience of the nation, and must be dealt with before long; the former is a matter of education, and men and women alike must see to it that boys, as well as girls, are brought up to think less of themselves and more of others, and to have the "self-reverence," "self-knowledge," and "self-control" which will "alone lead life to sovereign power."—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE GITTINS.

Leicester, Nov. 25, 1912.

SIR,—I fear your correspondent, Mrs. Günther, has seriously misinterpreted my letter in your issue of November 16. I must indeed have expressed my meaning badly for anyone to credit me with belief in "kid-glove" methods, in this or in any other social problem. My whole contention is that advocates of flogging, for the offence of procuring, do not really go to the root of the trouble. I doubt very much indeed if we can "put down this form of slavery" unless and until we have effectively stopped the supply of victims at its source: viz., criminally insufficient wages to women workers in all but the highest professions. I would earnestly suggest, to all who question this view, that the actual facts of the working woman's life such as are portrayed in so terribly vivid a manner in Reginald Kauffmann's book, the "Daughters of Ishmael," support my contention to the fullest extent. In the second place, we are entitled to inquire if your correspondent would be willing to volunteer for the horrible task of administering the flogging penalty to offenders of her own sex, were the Parliament Bill only logically equal in its treatment of men and women criminals? One feels most strongly that until, on the one hand, we are prepared (men and women alike) absolutely to boycott those men for whom the procurers ultimately work, who are as a matter of fact the real criminals, and without whose demand there would be no such evil means of making a living; and until, on the other hand, the women of to-day are allowed to know fully the dangers they will meet in the world; till both these things are more common the shameful trade will continue to sweep into its clutches its unhappy victims, flogging or no flogging. I was not aware that flogging was a custom in our Public Schools to-day, even on the part of the headmasters only. Is it not possible that your correspondent is confusing caning or birching with flogging? Finally, I would again thank you for permitting your columns to be used for the discussion of this grave matter and for your own attitude on this question.—Yours, &c.,

W. HARRIS CROOK.

November 24, 1912.

SIR,—In your article of November 9, and some of the subsequent correspondence on this subject, appeal is made to the Christian ideal as being opposed to all forms of corporal punishment; and it appears to be assumed that those who feel that such punishment should be meted out to those who are guilty of what all must admit is the foulest crime against humanity, are relapsing into barbarism. Your correspondent, Mr. E. W. Lummis, goes so far as to say, "In order to cast out the lesser devil" (i.e., the sin of procuration) "the House of Commons has invoked the very Prince of devils" (i.e., flogging). "Such are the snares that beset an unbridled moral indignation!" The plain man, however, feels impelled to ask, How does this fit in with the Christian ideal? We are told that in the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem he made a scourge of small cords and drove out those that bought and sold in the Temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers. Will Mr. Lummis say that Jesus was possessed with the Prince of devils? I think not. I think he will be more likely to say that the inner law of conscience stirred up in Jesus a flood of moral indignation against those who were polluting his Father's house with their traffic and merchandise—that the principles of Jesus led him into violence, and that being so led, he did not shrink or shrink from its exercise. How much more, then, are we justified in using violence to those who defile the very "image of God in a woman."

The danger at the present day seems to me to lie rather in a general tendency of tolerance towards those who seek to further their ends by violence, than in the possibility of any general relapse into barbarism by the use of violence against those who are sapping the very foundations of civilisation and morality by their inhuman practices.—Yours, &c.,

A. SAVAGE COOPER.

North Finchley, Nov. 23, 1912.

SIR,—To one who at the dictates of radical thought has been called upon to re-cast both theological and political belief, much of the correspondence appearing in your recent issues relating to "White Slavery" is interesting even where it fails to carry conviction. To purge society from sin by taking the life of sinners, imaginary or real, painlessly or otherwise, stands related to a barbarous past. Mr. Livens is prepared to hazard a present time expedient in the case of male offenders in the shape of the lash, but he is unable to cope with the female and refers her to Eternity. As a Christian and a Rationalist I suggest that the remedy equally true for male or female offenders would be that of imprisonment until there existed reasonable ground to believe that the offence would not be repeated, and that the whole object and conditions of all imprisonment should be absolutely subservient to the idea of the reclamation and restoration of the wrongdoer. Such an attitude to criminals knows no sex difficulty, and is more worthy of Christian pretensions. But the saddest feature of the correspondence is that while several correspondents are not without a consciousness of the fact that the real and truer slavery lies deeper down in our commercial and competitive system, the thought of its proper consideration is lightly brushed aside as being too hard for present attack. It is true of Society to-day that "They have sold a girl for wine that they might drink," and the effective voice of the Christian Church ought to be heard in unmistakeable protest.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN G. KAY.

Sunderland, November 25, 1912.

SIR,—Since "The greater contains the less," and since the crime under discussion is not only never free from cruelty, but holds within itself all other crimes, it is, therefore, the greatest of all evils; and, milder methods having failed, it seems unnecessary, as well as unjust, to conclude that the punishment of flogging is to be adopted merely as an act of retaliation, or as a vent to pent-up feeling rather than as a deterrent.—Yours, &c.,

THE FUTURE OF LITTLE PORTLAND STREET CHAPEL.

SIR,—May I be allowed to write a postscript to Mr. Tarrant's letter in your issue of November 9, which followed on to one written by Mr. Ronald Jones on November 2? Mr. Tarrant mentions the scheme which Mr. John Harrison hoped to work so as to obtain a better meeting place for Unitarians than Essex Hall. While that scheme was still only in its infancy there occurred an offer to purchase Little Portland-street Chapel at an advantageous figure, which nearly everyone felt was one that should not be refused.

The idea was to build another chapel in the central part of London, but while there continued uncertainty as to the future of what I may call Mr. Harrison's scheme we were advised not to form any plans for a chapel. After more than two years we were told that the original scheme for parting with Essex Hall had fallen through. The congregation therefore felt free to again discuss the possibility of obtaining a site and asking for assistance to build another chapel to carry on the traditions of Little Portland-street Chapel. The sub-committee were instructed to continue the search for a freehold site, and amongst others they found two, one perhaps rather larger than necessary for a chapel only, but suitable for rooms to be built adjoining for class-rooms and social work; the other in its vicinity an island plot which must be purchased entire, but which in skilful business hands could have been in part re-sold, leaving ample room not only for a chapel, but for a building worthy to be the home and central meeting place for all our various Associations. Those of us who conceived the idea felt that the scheme would be worthy of all the support which could be asked for from Unitarians in every part of the United Kingdom, as one of our great needs seems to be some central rallying place where ideas and schemes can be talked over amongst the various Associations so that there may be combined action amongst them. The scheme was roughly outlined in an interview with some of those specially interested in some of these Associations, but the idea was not cordially received, and the main reason urged against it was the situation of the site. This was not an essential part of the scheme, though the sub-committee have been actively at work inquiring for possible freehold sites for some years, and are aware of the extreme difficulty of obtaining a suitable freehold plot.

As there now seems a desire abroad to obtain a better central home for our work, is it not possible to amalgamate the two schemes? To obtain support not only for a glorified Essex Hall, but also for a small chapel adjoining or near it to carry on the free services such as were held in Little Portland-street Chapel, and also the social work at present done in the Little Titchfield Schools, the lease of which also soon terminates. There is the nucleus of a congregation, the nucleus of social work, and the nucleus of a fund wherewith to erect the chapel and classrooms—about £5,300. This work, it is proposed, should be carried on by an independent congregation as heretofore, and would not be attached to any of the Associations which it is hoped would find their homes in the adjoining building. It seems to have been accepted that the idea for the chapel is on too large a scale and too expensive. The Little Portland-street congregation have, however, never contemplated erecting a larger building than one to accommodate about 600 people, which was the size of Little Portland-street Chapel. Opinions differed, and probably still differ, as to the amount that should be spent on making it "beautiful," and the reality would depend on the amount of support gained for it. I may add that I have so far only mentioned matters that are known to all the members of our congregation who have interested themselves about schemes for our future, but that I am alone responsible for this letter to you, and have written it in the hope of interesting others in what I may call "the larger scheme."—Yours, &c.,

"THIRTY YEARS AFTER THE EJECTMENT."

SIR,—You and your readers, I feel sure, will be glad to hear that the interesting and valuable document, to which I had the pleasure of drawing attention some weeks ago in your columns is to be published. The MS. proves to be of first-rate importance in the early history of the English Presbyterians and Congregationalists, and students of that period will rejoice with me that the Rev. Alexander Gordon is to supply an introduction and editorial notes. The matter is so rich in reference to persons and congregations that some little time is needed in the editing, but it is hoped that this valuable work will be issued early in next year.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

A NOVEMBER PRIMROSE.

POOR old Mother Earth was very sad. She had clothed herself with a dull grey mantle, and every now and again shed bitter tears of sorrow because she felt so deserted and forlorn.

"Woe is me," she said, "All my gay friends have forsaken me, my sunshade has been blown to pieces, and only the ribs are left. The tiny coloured flowers have all died and gone to their long home; the leaves have been scattered broadcast, and lie on my bosom withered and destroyed, dead and unlovely. The birds have ceased to sing their pretty songs in the ribs of my umbrella, and I am left alone in my sadness."

"Why are you so sad?" said the Wind, as it raced over the green fields.

"Because at the time I need them most my friends have died, or gone away to other parts and left me."

"You have not looked around sufficiently," said the Wind, "for I have seen many of your friends as I came along."

"Oh, you always see something wonderful," said Mother Earth, in a sarcastic tone. "What friends of mine have you seen this time?"

"A tiny little primrose, in the front garden of a cottage, trying his very best to make the garden look pleasant."

"What good can one little primrose do in such a desolate time as this? Why doesn't he die like others, and keep his face out of the way until it is wanted," grumbled Mother Earth again.

"If you can't be more cheerful than that, I shall leave you," said the Wind, and he rushed away across the wood, rustling through the bare branches on his way to another place.

I walked along very sorrowful at heart, for my little girl was lying in her bedroom seriously ill. During the morning she had cried bitterly because all the primroses and daisies and buttercups had died. "Daddy," she said, "can't you find me one little daisy or primrose?"

"No, my darling, they have all died this year, and will not come out until next spring."

She turned her face away, and I heard her saying softly, "No more daisies, no more buttercups."

Presently she dropped off to sleep, and I went out for a walk into the country lanes to find a flower of some kind, that I might take it to her.

Growing by itself in a tiny cottage garden I saw a little primrose. I could hardly believe my eyes, because it was November 17. I opened the gate and walked up the path, and stood looking at the flower. As I stood lost in thought I heard the primrose talking to himself.

"What a desolate place it seems," he said, "my mother told me that when I grew up I should find a lot of other primroses and daisies and violets; but they all seem to have gone. She said the world would be nice and sunshiny and pleasant, but it is very sad and dull and I wonder why I have come. It is so lonely all by myself. There must be something wrong. Never mind, I will be strong, and as beautiful as I can, even though nobody takes any notice of me. I have been born to do and be my best, and I will do my duty."

"Brave little primrose," I thought, "I would like to take you home to my little girl."

As I stood watching the primrose I felt a light touch on my arm, and turned round. A young woman had come out of the cottage, and was watching me with sympathetic eyes.

"Are you in trouble?" she said.

"Yes," I answered, and then told her all about my little girl lying ill.

"Would you like to take the primrose for her?" she asked.

"If you could spare it," I said, "it will please her so much."

She plucked it from the root, and gave it to me saying, "Give it to her with my love."

I thanked her, and hurried home as fast as I could, and found my little one was awake.

"See what I have found for you, darling," I said, and gave her the primrose.

Her tiny face lighted up with a beautiful smile as she kissed me, and said, "Good Daddy," then kissing the primrose also she laid it beside her on the pillow.

The flower began to talk again, and as I listened I heard it say, "I am so happy. I thought I should die without doing anything or pleasing anybody. How glad I am that I have given someone pleasure. It was worth living alone for a little while. I can now die contented"; and I fancied it smiled.

Old Father Sun woke up, and smiled a smile that lighted up the whole world.

"Why are you so happy when everybody else is miserable?" said poor old Mother Earth in a nasty tone.

"Happy? Why shouldn't I be?" he said. "Haven't I just seen a November primrose bring happiness to a little girl who is ill? It has made me very happy, and I want others to see it. Can't you hear the birds singing in their joy?"

"I can hear a lot of chatter going on in the ribs of my umbrella," she said. "But where is this little girl and the primrose?"

"Over there," said Father Sun, pointing to a house by the roadside near a large beech tree.

Mother Earth turned her face to the house, and, looking through the window, saw a little girl asleep with a very happy expression on her face, and on the pillow by her side lay a primrose smiling to himself, and looking happy, too. As she gazed, the face of poor old Mother Earth softened, and she also began to feel joyous and contented.

"There," said the Wind, as he rushed along, "didn't I tell you I saw a little primrose down the road? He has given up his life to make somebody happy"; and he laughed so heartily in his delight that he made all the trees laugh, too, until their sides shook.

"Yes," said Mother Earth, "I was wrong. I won't grumble any more. You have all conspired to make me happy, and you have succeeded. I wish you all good-night"; and she went peacefully to sleep, and so did the Sun, and the birds, and the primrose; but the Wind rushed along like a madman because, as he said, "I am so happy." R. H.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE MISSION SERVICES AT MANCHESTER.

WHAT would a "Mission" be like, transplanted from the customary atmosphere of Revivalism, or stripped of the ecclesiastical accessories which accompany "Missions" in the Church of England, and brought into the unfamiliar environment of Unitarian churches? No one could have said a priori what the character and worth of such an attempt would be. And even now, when the Simultaneous Mission held in the churches of the Manchester District has come and gone, it is too soon to register results, or, indeed, to make any general estimate beyond the obvious fact that it has been a very real and signal experience. Looked forward to and prepared for through the many months which have elapsed since we held our conferences—so instinct with a painful sense of gravity and even foreboding—earlier in the year, when we met to consider the present state of our churches, the Mission has been for our people a much-needed opportunity to concentrate, if only for one brief week, upon the spiritual issues with which we are concerned, with which, in fact, we are supremely concerned, but which, in the practical conduct of our church life, are actually made to take a very inconspicuous position among a crowd of bustling interests. This opportunity for concentration has been given, and there are signs that it has been seized upon with eagerness and delight. That, at any rate, is so much to the good. For, from the first, it was decided that the Mission must be primarily to ourselves. A time for united prayer on certain special and vital needs, the sense of being for several appointed days in a fellowship of intense longings and definite aims, the bending of wayward individualisms (for once in a way!) to a settled and collectively ordered plan of meetings, the linking up of the various congregations by the partial exchange of pulpits, and the innovation of the week-night service—all this has made its impression, and if the impression is largely a conviction that we have much to learn in the matter of Missions, so much the better.

The Central Mission Committee, which had the duty of drawing up a scheme of meetings and services to be recommended to the individual congregations, was careful to leave plenty of room for choice and initiative, and, of course, each church went its own way. In one or two churches the week evenings were partly used for emphasising special departments of institutional work rather than for a series of religious services in the ordinary sense, one evening being given to Women's work, another to the Guild, and so forth. The general plan was as follows:—First, on Saturday evening, a "Congregational Revival Meeting," which was addressed by chosen members of the particular congregation (one of these a lady wherever possible), and by a visitor from outside the district (so as to keep all the ministers and members at their own churches for that evening). The special subject for this evening was Congregational Loyalty. For the Sunday, it was suggested that the burden of the services and sermons should be Our Spiritual Message. At one only of the Sunday Services a change of pulpits was suggested. It was also suggested that the young people should have a Mission Service arranged specially for them in the afternoon. The week-night service, or services, might be taken either by the minister of the church or by another minister of the district. Then the whole Mission was to be fitly wound up by a United Gathering at Cross-street Chapel (service) and at the Memorial Hall (public meeting) on the following Saturday.

This detailed plan was carried out by the churches with great loyalty and devotion, and we shall soon have to revise some of our notions as to the anarchic tendencies of our free and non-subscribing congregations. Perhaps the most direct and striking impression of all was made upon the collected congregations on Saturday, when a great gathering filled the body of Cross-street Chapel and overflowed into the galleries. Rarely could the grand old building have seen a more earnestly intent and obviously rapt company of worshippers, for the feeling permeated all, that, great as had been the history symbolised by those venerable walls, we were now reaching after a new manifestation of the Divine Life—no longer sufficiently embodied for us in the heroic struggles for freedom and emancipation from dogmas of dead ages, but demanding a living voice and one speaking to our present need. As we listened to the powerful pleading of the preacher, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, there grew up the vision of the days that are soon coming when a definite, positive, irresistible loyalty of faith and devotion shall drive the old barren nebulosities into oblivion. Already this higher note had been struck in two papers by the Rev. N. Anderton and Mr. Hugh Herford, which had been circulated widely in preparation for the Mission. Nothing could be of more hopeful augury than the way in which these utterances have been welcomed as "the very thing" that has too long been lacking in our preaching and our outlook. It is the day of a new spiritual envisagement of the things men really live by. What wonder if at such a time we are startled into a new sense of the strangeness and power of the faith we hold. That, and a new discovery of the centrality (for religion) of experience—personal, individual, felt realisation of the inward work of God—have been the notes of the Manchester Mission, for which many will long thank God.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AUTUMN MEETINGS AT SHEFFIELD.

THE Autumnal Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were held at Sheffield on Wednesday and Thursday, November 20 and 21. A considerable number of delegates attended in addition to members of the churches in the neighbourhood, and admirable arrangements had been made by the local committee for the comfort of their visitors. Excellent reports of the proceedings appeared in the Sheffield newspapers, the Daily Independent and the Daily Telegraph.

WEDNESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The proceedings began on Wednesday afternoon with a reception at which Mr. W. Laycock presided.

The Rev. C. J. Street, in the course of a welcome to their visitors, said that sometimes the question was raised as to how far they were a missionary body, and what justification they had for taking that title. "We realise," he said, "that our own religion is to us the best, and we love it deeply, and are prepared to make sacrifices for it, but at the same time we understand, or think we understand, that other people who have not been brought up in such ways as we have love their religion, too, and we find many points of contact between others and ourselves. Under all the differences there are great fundamental resemblances. And it does not even matter whether they call themselves Christians—outside the Christian body as well as among the various Christian denominations there are great fundamental principles of religion upon which we can all unite." They felt, for instance, that their business was not to go to India to Christianise India, but to go to help the Indian people in working out—through their own Brahma Samaj (Theistic Church of India)—their own salvation in their own way with their own religious traditions behind them, "and who in the course of time," he added, "have come to pretty much the same position as we have, though they don't call themselves Christians." God had taught people not to call any man common or unclean; He had enabled them to see that all religions were themselves good; and the question was as to what form of religion was best fitted to a particular country or a particular individual.

The Rev. Thomas Anderson, speaking on behalf of the Barnsley, Mexborough, and Bolton-on-Dearne churches, said he should like it to be realised what it meant to take a stand for freedom in small places like these. The churches were making great progress in these three towns.

The President of the Association (Mr. Charles Hawksley, of London), who acknowledged the welcome, also declared that he was not in favour of proselytising in the usual sense of the word; and their Association did not seek to disturb other people in their respective religions where those religions satisfied them. "I don't care much what they call themselves," said the President; "but we do care for religious freedom—that each person should be able to think as he pleases and to worship in the manner he pleases. And I do not presume to say that any form is right and that all other forms are wrong."

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie also replied, and paid a tribute to the press in Sheffield for its intelligent and broad-minded interest in religion.

A Conference followed on "Women's Work in our Churches," when papers were given by Miss E. Rosalind Lee (Stourbridge) and Mrs. Sydney Martineau (London). Mrs. W. R. Stevenson (Sheffield), who presided, and gave a brief address on the subject, caused some amusement by remarking that "some of our clerical friends seem to think that the world is going to be saved by committee meetings."

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson (Gee Cross) delivered an address on "The call of the churches to sustain the stipends of their ministers." He made a striking appeal for contributions to the Sustentation Fund. An appeal, he said, had been made for £50,000, and towards this £38,000 had already been raised.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who opened a conference on "Unitarian Thought on Vital Problems of Religion," which was presided over by the President of the Association (Mr. Charles Hawksley), said that Unitarians repudiated the claims of those who claimed a monopoly, thinking themselves the only custodians of truth, the only wardens of the Kingdom of Heaven. Most of all, they deplored the bigotries and evil thoughts which had for so long divided and embittered Christianity, and had for so long kept up the consequent belief in an everlasting hell.

In the evening a service was held in the Upper Chapel conducted by the Rev. H. E. Dowson. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Mr. W. R. Stevenson presided at the organ.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

"The Religious Education of the Young" was the principal subject of the morning conference, at which Mr. G. H. Hunt presided.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding (President of the Sunday School Association), regarded as one of the most necessary works of the Association the watching of the course of public events in regard to Sunday-school life, because the time had not yet come when they could be satisfied with the character of the teaching dispensed among young people in the elementary schools of the country. They could understand, of course, those that had a distinctly Anglican complexion, despite all the laws of the land, teaching doctrines which were characteristic of orthodoxy, but it was a fact that in the non-provided schools there was still taught the miraculous birth and miracles and all kinds of things distasteful to Unitarians. They believed that the children of the Unitarian parents should be trained to ideals of citizenship which he believed were in many respects infinitely higher than those prevalent among other bodies.

Mr. Ion Pritchard regarded as "a criminal mistake" the teaching of what the child should not do rather than what it ought to do.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson hoped that, as a result of the "forward movement" in Unitarian schools, the instruction would be more truly religious, and that in a year or two there would be no reason to ask what the Sunday schools were for.

The Rev. J. W. Cock urged that rather than counteract the influence of the day school, they should make their own teaching so strong and vital that it would touch the inner spirit of the child, and thus make it involuntarily recognise the truth.

The Rev. W. L. Schroeder made a protest against the reflection upon the teaching profession implied in the suggestion that distinctively denominational instruction was given in the elementary schools. Sunday schools were not, in his opinion, an integral part of the universe, and might pass out of existence, but the religious education of the young must always remain a problem. A good deal of the teaching in Sunday schools was inefficient, and he feared the methods resorted to for filling them were far from realising the real purpose for which they existed. Rather than have an inadequate Sunday school and incompetent teachers he would close the school and have a children's church. He doubted if all the talk about schemes of visitation and organisation would effect the needed reform.

A conference on "The Mission of the Printed Word," which followed, under the chairmanship of Mr. Charles Hawksley, was addressed by the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., Mr. G. H. Leigh (President of the Manchester District Association), the Rev. Alfred Hall, and others.

THE LUNCHEON.

The delegates were entertained to luncheon at the Grand Hotel by Mr. M. J. Hunter, in whose absence Mr. A. J. Hobson (ex-Lord Mayor) presided.

In proposing "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association," Mr. Hobson paid a tribute to the "widest possible liberty" that characterised the Unitarian churches—carrying the idea to the extreme of imposing upon their members no creed, while the voluntary nature of their government was evidenced in the title of the body meeting in Sheffield that day—Association.

Mr. Charles Hawksley (President of the Association), in responding, expressed the pleasure the delegates had in meeting the members of an old congregation like that at Sheffield, which had been in active existence since 1700, and which was established nearly fifty years earlier. They were delighted to find the old church so full of life still.

The Rev. W. R. Shanks proposed "The Sunday School Association," and said the urgent problem of the present day was the retention of the scholars, and especially the young men—because they could be sure of the women. They were finding in the schools of the industrial, vigorous north greater difficulty in getting teachers who could handle the lads. It was urgently necessary to devote attention to the lively, irresponsible boy who did not see much in the Sunday school or chapel. In the Boy Scouts' movement he believed they had a possible line, and one that he had found very fruitful. There was also, he thought, need for getting at the scholar through his or her emotion and feeling more than had been done hitherto, instead of concerning themselves simply with the mind. They wanted something more distinctively religious and devotional.

Mr. Ion Pritchard, in reply, appealed for a more sympathetic and helpful appreciation of the difficulties of the teacher in the problem of interesting the scholars.

The Rev. A. H. Dolphin proposed "The National Conference," and, in reply, its President, Mr. Hugh Rathbone, spoke of a growing sympathy towards the Unitarian position in the Church of England, some of whose members felt they were missing something that the Unitarians possessed. He concluded with an appeal on behalf of the £50,000 fund with which the Sustentation Fund hoped to improve the status of their ministers.

Mrs. Sinclair (Sheffield) proposed the British League of Unitarian Women. Miss Lee responded.

"The District Associations" was proposed by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, and responded to by the Rev. Simon Jones.

AFTERNOON CONFERENCE.

"Our Missionary Work Under Present-Day Conditions" was the subject of the afternoon conference.

Mr. W. G. Turner, who presided, urged the need for interesting the scholars, whom they hoped to retain in church membership, not only on Sundays, but in their week-day life.

The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, in discussing the conditions and history of local churches drew from his investigations the conclusion that a free theological position could engender an enthusiasm, while denominationalism failed to satisfy. He admitted a prejudice against the name Unitarianism, but after all it had accomplished he would feel ashamed if he was anything else. They were, however, willing to enlarge the title and taken in Free Christians and Free Congregationalists, because Unitarians had been all that those terms implied all along.

Mr. Percy Preston dealt with national opportunities, and in the discussion which followed Mr. Grosvenor Talbot pointed to a need for a more highly trained and erudite type of missionary to combat the claims of orthodoxy and the denials of the unbeliever. The Rev. Simon Jones sought to stir up Unitarians from their self-satisfied and exclusive intellectualism to a policy of pushfulness, and to fire their members with a passion for missionary enterprise.

THE EVENING MEETING.

In the evening a large public meeting was held in Upper Chapel.

Mr. A. J. Hobson, who presided, said that he rejoiced in the liberty of thought and conscience for which Unitarians stood, and pointed to the danger of the absence of so strong a central body as a more definite form of government might provide. There was all the more need for a loyal and generous support of that central body, and he appealed to Sheffield Unitarians to make a more liberal response to its needs.

The Rev. Neander Anderton, speaking on "Heroisms of the Past," said the Christian Church had great reason to be proud of its heroes. At the head they placed the Master, because Unitarians were not prepared to allow orthodoxy an exclusive reverence for Christ. His was one of the grandest heroisms of history, a typical example of the heroism of the Church, the triumph over the body for the liberation of the soul.

The Rev. C. J. Street, speaking on "The Hopes of the Future," said: "I gaze into the future, and what do I see? I see, amongst other things, creeds and theologies and ordinances, good in their way, taking the quite secondary place which they merit, and yielding sway to the fervent reality of religion which is sempiternal, always rejuvenating itself, always universally adapting itself to the special needs of races and individuals; I see worship no longer content with self-depreciation and fawning adulation and selfish petitions, but marking the soul's consciousness of its kinship with God, eagerly demanding its own. I see not one comprehensive Church, as some people dream of, but which I believe to be as undesirable as it is impossible, but a multitude of worshipping assemblies regulating their own method and shape of faith according to their own light and conscience, each respecting the other and co-operating as far as they possibly can in all things essential. I see the nation conscientiously training its young people to make the best use of their facilities, fitting each of them first and foremost for his and her own life's work, cultivating the graces of character, and leaving to parents and churches to develop their religion. I see society no longer given over to cut-throat competition, sharply divided between extremes of luxury and destitution, but welded together in fraternal solidarity, giving everyone his fair opportunity, each for all and all for each. Is the dream too good? Is it too much to hope for? No, because God is, but God does His work through human instruments."

Mrs. Sydney Martineau followed with an address on "The Duties of the Present."

Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, speaking on "Religion and Life," confessed himself an optimist, despite the existing conditions, which seemed to point to so great a divergence between religion and the everyday life of the world; he believed the golden age of Christianity was dawning.

The Rev. Alfred Hall gave the last address on "The Call of Truth."

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF THE MEETINGS.

BY ONE WHO WAS THERE.

THERE was no mistaking what was going on at the Upper Chapel and Channing Hall during last week, and he who ran might read, on a streamer the length of Channing Hall "National Unitarian Autumn Meetings." It was a new name, but it served; and it was well to have a distinctive name, for the Sheffield Church Convention was in session, while several other missionary organisations held meetings too. Our meetings grew in interest as the time slipped away. There were present representatives of societies and churches in the country, members of the old-established congregations in the neighbourhood, and new friends from the enterprising districts of Mexborough, Bolton-on-Deane, Doncaster, and Barnsley.

It was good to hear the Rev. T. Anderson, the enthusiastic district minister, and it would have been good to hear the Rev. Percy Jones, under whom the old Unitarian congregation, and those who came out with him from the Congregational Church in Doncaster have united, and formed a vigorous free church. Mr. Anderson invited his hearers to imagine what it meant to make a stand for liberal religion with a minimum of equipment and a maximum of sincerity as at Barnsley where services are carried on with courage in an upper room which is reached by two flights of steep steps; with pluck and endurance which gave an average week-night congregation of thirty at Bolton-on-Deane; and at Mexborough where he had experienced his larger birth, and had learned a greater peace of mind than he had known before.

The Women's Meeting, now a feature at most of our assemblies, led the way in spirit and vigour. It produced three speakers who should prove a valuable addition to the list of women speakers in the country. The meeting began late because the men had taken so long over the welcome, but it ended five minutes before time—crisp, bright, spirited and cheerful. It is gratifying to feel that the number of capable women speakers in our ranks is, thanks to the League's work, being steadily increased.

Mr. Dowson had a session to himself, as he deserved. He never gave a brighter address in his life; it was all new, and everybody was delighted at his vigour, and the enthusiasm with which he is setting about completing the raising of the fund of £50,000 for the sustentation of ministers' salaries. There are certain individuals in the denomination who can do anything they set their hands to: Mr. Dowson is one of them, and everybody will delight to see him reach this goal, and help him on the way. What an asset it is to have such men, and to find them always on the side of the big things!

The address by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on "Unitarian Thought on Vital Questions of Religion" was one worthy of publication as a tract for wide distribution. It was in touch with the problems of life and religion which beset the business man and the worker. Its point was "Individual Responsibility," and it dealt with sin, the place of Scripture, God as a companion, and salvation. We hope to have this telling address in our hands for distribution; it will be a valuable missionary aid.

It was an unusual experience to find well-known ministers preparing to leave before the great service in the Upper Chapel, but there was reason for their departure. Following the plan adopted some time ago when the autumn meeting was held in Belfast, services and meetings had been arranged at various outlying churches, and these ministers were going on duty. Their experiences differed, the assemblies they addressed were not all large, but the same spirit was present in all, and the utterances were governed by that frankness and directness which is always helpful. The only one of the addresses to be reported was Mr. Bowie's, and it was delivered in the presence of a large congregation, which, however, did not strain the accommodation of Upper Chapel.

Thursday morning saw a growing congregation assemble for worship, led by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder. Immediately following there was the meeting of the Sunday School Association, Mr. Hunt presiding. The general topic was "The Religious Education of Our Young People: What is the Sunday School Association doing to Promote it?"

The Luncheon is always an attractive feature at our big meetings. At Sheffield the speaking was of a high order, the only thing wanting being the presence of the kindly host whose hospitality we were obliged to enjoy in his absence. All felt deep sympathy with Mr. Hunter and regretted the bereavement which had caused his absence. Mr. Hobson (ex-Lord Mayor) presided. It has seldom been our privilege to hear the claims of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the support of all sorts and conditions of Unitarians more forcefully put than by Mr. Hobson. Indeed we can only think of one occasion, and that was at the public meeting in the Upper Chapel the same evening, by Mr. Hobson himself. While everybody else takes the opportunity offered by the meetings of the Association to plead the cause in which he is especially interested, the claims of the Association fail to get that clear treatment which they deserve. There was a welcome change at Sheffield, and we cordially hope that Mr. Hobson's desire that Sheffield should send more subscriptions will become an accomplished fact, and that Sheffield's example will be improved upon elsewhere—if there is a place with more enthusiasm than Sheffield. We cannot single out the speeches for special reference; they were all happy and bright, pointed and effective.

We missed the afternoon meeting because of the valuable hints and counsel of a friend, whom we always find stimulating and suggestive, and in whose company we too seldom found ourselves. But we heard of one speech that followed Mr. Dolphin's paper, which led to the remark, "It would pay to get that man to go round and tell the story of this missionary movement, just as he told it this afternoon." This observation was reported with obvious glee, and we are accordingly sorry to have missed one of the telling, homely addresses to which the dialect can lend force.

The public meeting was something like a public meeting. The floor of the chapel was filled. The singing was good, led by an organist who delights in his instrument, and at the same time believes in congregational singing. There is no fear of him doing anything but resign if ever it is put to the Upper Chapel congregation that they should "Join in the worship silently." It was good to hear Yorkshire singing; it made one anything but content to listen; everybody had to join in. We can say little of the meeting. The chairman discharged his duties with conspicuous success, and the speakers followed him with admirable spirit and judgment. Sheffield is to be congratulated upon its reception of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association, and the two presidents with their indefatigable secretaries may rightly feel that all who were fortunate enough to be able to attend will have gone back to their own churches determined to make them, with God's help, count for more than they have ever done in the past.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

AUTUMN MEETING.

THE autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at the Unitarian Christian Church, Lewisham, on Tuesday evening last, the 26th inst. The President of the Society, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., occupied the chair, and he was supported by Mr. Athelstane A. Tayler (Chairman of the Society), the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope, the Rev. E. E. Coleman, the Rev. Douglas W. Robson, Mr. Ronald P. Jones (Treasurer), and the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (District Minister).

The Chairman said that he was sometimes appalled at the conditions obtaining in London, with its wealth and luxury on the one hand and dire poverty on the other, and he was glad when he thought that Unitarians, though at times in small detachments, were bound together in a great spirit and enterprise to do what good they could amongst their brothers and sisters. He felt that they were doing what they could to help others to a right way of living and thinking, and, above all, in appealing to the souls of men. Wealth was not the test of courage and purity of life, but the test was in the soul of man. Old creeds were becoming discredited and men were turning away from such; many going over to unbelief, and it was their duty to call them back to the belief in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

The Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope gave a hearty welcome to the London District Unitarian Society to Lewisham, and said that they were faced with a curious position to-day when liberal thinkers were considering the discredited creeds of orthodoxy; that whilst those with such creeds seemed to have a lot of enthusiasm and full churches, those who had a free and simple religion and were intellectually certain of their religion, having advanced beyond the others, did not have the full churches. The new note that was needed in the congregational life of the liberal thinkers was that although their members had come to feel that they could go alone in their faith, sure of their steps, they ought not to desert but to stay and help others to get on to their feet.

The Treasurer, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, put in a plea for a wider circle of subscribers to the Society's finances in view of the good work that was being done in and around London. Speaking about discredited creeds, Mr. Jones said that there was still an enormous amount of steady-going, narrow orthodoxy existing. A large number of religious people were still wrapped up in what was, to them, an old-fashioned orthodoxy. The Unitarian function was and still is to lead intelligent opinion in a free and liberal direction, but the Unitarian ought not to expect, always, that those who were led in that way would of necessity join him.

The Rev. E. E. Coleman said his impression was that in the Church of England there were a few distinguished scholars who did not see fit to dogmatise after the fashion of their ancestors, but with regard to the bulk, the clergy were pitifully ignorant of the lines along which men were thinking to-day. That was not quite true in the same degree of representatives of Nonconformity, and the speaker thought that some of his Unitarian friends would be astonished if they knew how much sympathy there was for a liberal religion in churches commonly called orthodox. In them there was a considerable leavening of progressive thought, though usually the official element was against a movement in that direction. He believed in the significance of small communities. Many who were compelled to give up the doctrine of eternal punishment, as they had to give it up, did not realise that they were undermining the very structure of their theology. Whilst this was not prophetic that Unitarian churches were going to carry everything before them, it was prophetic of the fact that in the religious life of the country the great principles for which Unitarian churches stood would remain in the future. The gospel of a progressive Christianity appealed to the needs and aspiration of the time.

The Rev. Douglas W. Robson spoke of "Liberal Theology and Modern Missions." Mr. A. A. Tayler and the Rev. J. A. Pearson also addressed the meeting.

CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

THE Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from the Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E. :—"I wish to make an earnest appeal to your readers for contributions to the Poor's Purse at the Mansford-street Mission. I had a smaller balance than usual to bring forward at the beginning of this year, and with many claims upon the funds, this was soon exhausted. But there have been many cases since then which I could not refuse to help; consequently the account is now largely overdrawn. I appeal to your readers to help me pay off this deficit and to give me a good balance to begin the New Year with. We have also a Christmas Fund, towards which I shall be glad to receive contributions."

It is announced that the Jowett Lecture will be delivered on Wednesday, December 11, at 8.30 p.m., in the Library of the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, W.C., by the Rev. Canon Rashdall, Litt.D. Subject: "The Idea of the Church." Chairman, the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, D.D. (Dean of St. Paul's). Admission will be free to the public. On account of the revival of the Hibbert Lectures, there will be this year, and in future, a single Jowett Lecture instead of a course of lectures as hitherto.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Blackburn.—The local branch of the Women's League is actively pursuing its way. In the nature of things, energy has to be mainly directed to increasing the building fund, and with this in view the ladies held an "At Home" on November 14. The church room was tastefully decorated, and about 100 guests assembled to enjoy a musical programme which had been arranged by Miss Almond, L.R.A.M. On November 23 a League Rally was held. Contingents came from neighbouring branches. Greetings were brought by the various representatives, and an address was delivered by Miss Helen Brooke Herford. Miss Gardner, M.A., presided.

Dudley.—Mr. E. Glyn Evans, who is at present completing his studies at the Victoria University, and the Unitarian College, Manchester, has been unanimously elected pastor of the Old Meeting House Church, Wolverhampton-street, and chaplain of Baylis's Schools. He has accepted the appointments and will commence his duties at the close of his college session.

Great Yarmouth.—Temperance Sunday was observed on Sunday, November 24, when Mr. Geo. Ward (Bury St. Edmunds) gave an address on "The Way to a Sober England." There was a large congregation. On Monday evening (under the auspices of the Suffolk Temperance Federation) Mr. Ward gave a lecture in the Town Hall on "Alcohol and Race Culture." Mr. J. Williment, J.P., presided.

Halifax: The late Mr. A. Wadsworth.—The Northgate End Chapel has sustained a severe loss by the death of Mr. Arnold H. Wadsworth, which took place on November 17, at the early age of 38. He had been connected with the congregation and Sunday school all his life. For many years he had been a teacher, and at the time of his death was superintendent in the Sunday school. He was a member of the Chapel Committee, and also a trustee of the chapel. Amongst other offices which he held in connection with the place were that of treasurer of the Mutual Improvement Society and president of the Band of Hope. The Band of Hope movement ever had his warm support, and at various periods he had been treasurer and president of the Halifax and District Band of Hope Union. He had also been president of the Yorkshire Unitarian Club. Politically Mr. Wadsworth was a staunch Liberal, and had been an active worker in connection with the Central Ward Liberal Club and Council. The British Commercial Temperance Association received his warm support, and in many other ways he had been a useful citizen. He was a well-known Freemason, being a member of St. John's Lodge. Mr. Wadsworth had an extensive business, and his amiable disposition had won him a host of friends both in and out of town. He leaves a widow and three sons to mourn his loss. The funeral took place at Northgate End Chapel, and afterwards at Stoney-road Cemetery on November 20, and was very largely attended. The Rev. W. L. Schroeder, who conducted the memorial service, at the close gave a brief address. There were some men, he said, who attracted by their brilliant gifts, or by their intellectual achievements; there were others who claimed our hearts by virtue of their good nature, generosity of disposition, and the tender pity for all who were in trouble or sorrow. Mr. Wadsworth was among the latter. A man of modest disposition, shy even in the estimate of his own worth, he was always generous with his time and with his mind, laying claim to our affections by virtue of the goodness of his life. When he (Mr. Schroeder) thought of him in any characteristic position, he recalled his figure as he stood at the desk in the Sunday school, giving out the hymns in a shy, almost reluctant way, at times as if he felt the honour of his office to be too great. He (the speaker) thought of the hymns he read all the way through, dwelling on phrases that seemed to touch his heart. Most of all he associated him with the hymn just sung, a verse of which might be a fitting motto and characteristic of his life:

"To duty firm, to conscience true,
However tried and pressed,
In God's clear sight, high work we do
If we but do our best."

Hyde Chapel: Welcome to the Rev. F. H. Vaughan.—The annual soiree of Hyde Chapel congregation this year, which was held on Tuesday, November 19, in the schoolroom, was of more than ordinary interest, on account of the advent of the new minister, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, and a reception was held in his honour. Amongst those present were the Rev. H. E. and Mrs. Dowson, the Rev. F. H. and Miss Vaughan, the Rev. H. E. and Mrs. Perry, Mrs. A. T. Hibbert, Miss Dowson, Councillor Percy Hibbert, Councillor and Mrs. Jos. Hibbert, Mrs. A. Aspland, the Misses Aspland, Councillor W. Robinson, Mr. John Rowcroft, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Slater, Mr. John Hall Brooks, Mr. W. Woolley, and other members of the congregation. Mr. W. Hudson occupied the chair, and supporting him on the platform were the new minister, Mr. Vaughan, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas (of Birmingham), Mr. Birch (of Mansfield), and Councillor P. Hibbert. The chairman expressed the pleasure he had in being their chairman that night, for they were about to put the finishing touch upon the momentous decision arrived at at their annual meeting, when they resolved to invite Mr. Vaughan to come and be a minister at their chapel. That was Mr. Vaughan's welcome soiree. They were not only giving a welcome to him, but also to his sister, Miss Vaughan. Mr. Vaughan came to them not as an untried man. He had had long experience in ministerial work. Not only did he bear a record for able ministerial work, but he had made himself felt wherever he had been in the public offices of the town. Wherever he had been he had gained the respect, esteem, and affection, not only of his own congregation, but of the whole community in which he lived. He thought they might consider themselves most fortunate that he had accepted their invitation; but while they congratulated themselves somewhat on that score, they must not be unmindful of their obligations to him. Mr. Percy Hibbert, in giving a welcome on behalf of the congregation, said that he was sure Mr. Vaughan felt a responsibility in coming to assist in the work with Mr. Dowson, who had carried it on all those years, and he was quite sure the congregation felt a deep responsibility in inviting Mr. Vaughan to fill that onerous and responsible position. They had heard of the great place Mr. Vaughan filled in the life of the Mansfield congregation and in the life of Mansfield, and the people there were sorry he was leaving to come to Gee Cross. He was sure there was in their mind, as well as in his, a sense of responsibility in inviting him to come there to take up the work, and there was a sense of responsibility in themselves to assist Mr. Vaughan to carry out that work. Mr. Birch, of the Mansfield congregation, added a few cordial words. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas next spoke, congratulating them upon securing such a man as his friend Mr. Vaughan as their minister. He believed he had done wisely and well—in spite of the great position he had made for himself in Mansfield—in coming to Gee Cross, where he would have a larger opportunity for work, and a larger congregation to minister to. In his concluding remarks the speaker made a strong appeal to them to attend the Sunday services, and co-operate with Mr. Vaughan in his work. When he rose to respond Mr. Vaughan was accorded a very hearty welcome. He felt, he said, he was coming home, and although he had not come to Gee Cross previously, he had lived four years in Manchester as a student, and once they had lived in the north they always felt they wanted to be in the north. He thanked them for the good things that had been said. He hoped they would deal leniently with him, and allow him a little time to get to know them. To get to know their faces would be a piece of work, and to get to know all their names would take perhaps as much time as it did to learn a new language. He asked for freedom—that they would not expect him to preach what they believed, but that they would expect him to preach and work out every truth that God, in His great abundance and mercy, might reveal to them. Mr. Dowson, being next called upon, said Mr. Vaughan was coming to a congregation generously full of fellowship to their minister. If any minister was grateful to his people he was grateful to them, and those who offered him a free pulpit. A free pulpit was the very heart of heaven—freedom to speak without hindrance, to go to political meetings, and he had once or twice been to political meetings—would they believe it! He assured Mr. Vaughan that a minister at Hyde Chapel was not to be a cleric, but just a man among men, a fellow citizen with all those around the chapel as well as those within it. He was happy to think of the church he loved in the hands of Mr. Vaughan. He had been very anxious about the coming time when the congregation would be without him, when he was gone, and he was almost ready; he had such faith in that church with Mr. Vaughan. Might God bless the people he had lived for, and God bless Mr. Vaughan, the minister they had chosen.

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—The subject of Dr. J. E. Odgers' lecture, delivered at Essex Hall on Friday, November 22, was "Unitarianism in England." After referring to the martyrdom of Legate and Whiteman in 1612, Dr. Odgers proceeded to show that the Socinian divines in England were important by reason of the ethical standpoint from which they approached the problems of theology, and of their toleration and modesty, rather than because of the value of their intellectual contribution, towards the development of religious thought. The views and work of John Bidle, Thomas Firmin, John Taylor of Norwich, Belsham, Priestley and Lindsey, among others, were passed under review; and in dealing with the growth amongst the Presbyterians of the feeling against compulsory subscription to articles of faith, the lecturer spoke of a book published about the year 1736 by James Strong, of Ilminster, and bearing some such title as "The Shorter Catechism Revised for the Use of the Young." He had tried in vain to obtain a copy of this work, although he had read a large amount of literature directed against it on account of its broad and tolerant character. If any reader of this column has seen or heard of any copy of the book, mentioned, he is requested to kindly communicate with Dr. Odgers. The changes of thought concerning the doctrines of the Atonement and of Original Sin were briefly indicated, and the differences between the Unitarianism of Lindsey and the broader Presbyterian were illustrated. The subject of the concluding lecture will be "Unitarianism in America."

London Sunday School Society.—A very successful social evening for teachers and elder scholars was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, November 23, when fully 350 guests were welcomed by Mr. Herbert Gimson, the President of the Society, on behalf of the Committee. After an hour spent in social intercourse, an excellent programme of music and recitations was given. The arrangements had been made by the Women's Social Club, the entertainment committee of which, and Mrs. Freeston in particular, are warmly to be thanked for their efforts. During the course of the evening Mrs. Gimson presented to the Rhyl-street School the Cricket Shield of the Laymen's Club, which had been won by that School's XI.

London: Wood Green.—Mrs. Sydney Martineau opened the annual sale of work, held in the large hall attached to Unity Church, on Saturday, November 23. A sum of about £100 was realised towards church expenses.

Manchester: Longsight.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, November 17, when the sermons were preached by the Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. A sacred cantata, entitled, "Christian Graces," was given in the afternoon by the scholars and teachers, assisted by members of the choir. The minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, conducted the devotional part of the service.

Manchester.—Miss M. Wolff, of Hale, in the course of some criticism of the music at the united service held at Cross-street Chapel last Saturday, and especially of the singing of Matheson's hymn "O Love that will not let me go" to a strange tune, writes as follows:—"I suppose it is a 'counsel of perfection' to wish that one day we might have one hymn book with tunes attached, and use it in all our chapels. But I do think we lose a great deal in not having universal tunes anyway to all the best known and most frequently sung hymns. We should all resent it if 'Christians Awake' or 'Come, ye thankful people,' were taken to new tunes (however beautiful). There is a charm in words and music intermingling in one's mind, and, I think, even though probably all would not agree as to the best tunes, if once we got accustomed to them (care being taken in the first instance to find out what tune was used by the majority to certain words) it would be better than leaving the choice entirely in the hands of one man—the organist—as is now most often done. If anyone should not know where Dr. Peace's tune to Matheson's hymn is to be found, it is in the musical edition of the "New Hymnal" and in the Congregational "Worship Song."

Pontypridd.—An excellent concert was given at the New Town Hall on Thursday, November 21, organised by the committee of the Unitarian Church, which it is acknowledged on all hands contributes much to the musical education of the town. Madame Goodwin, Mr. Louis Pecscai, and Madame Janet Garnett, were the artistes, and one of the items on the programme which was most appreciated was Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," beautifully rendered by Madame Goodwin and Mr. Pecscai.

Scottish Unitarian Association: Annual Meeting.—The fifty-second annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Association was held in St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, on Saturday, November 23, Dr. J. K. Wood presiding. Prior to the meeting the delegates, who represented all the Unitarian Churches of Scotland and also the Universalist Church at Stenhousemuir, were entertained to tea, provided by the friends of St. Vincent-street Church. The annual reports, submitted by the secretary, showed that the Committee had done a great deal of active work during the past year in promoting the cause of Unitarianism in Scotland. With the help of the various Scottish ministers and a number of laymen, they had been able to assist in carrying on regular Sunday services at Stenhousemuir and Kirkcaldy. They had also continued publishing the little monthly periodical called the "Scottish Unitarian," and had sent supplies to each Church for free distribution to their members. A successful Unitarian Conference had also been held at Dundee during the visit to that city of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. It was stated that during the past two years the Association had reduced the bonds of £600 on the Kilmarnock Church property by £133. The membership of the Association had increased slightly during the year. The following office bearers were re-elected:—President, Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee; vice-president, William Kirkhope, Edinburgh; secretary, A. MacLaren, Glasgow; and treasurer, V. G. Jennings, Glasgow. The usual vote of thanks concluded a very successful meeting.

Stratford: Welcome to the Pioneer Preachers.

—On Saturday evening, November 16, the congregations of the Unitarian Churches at Stratford, Forest Gate, and Walthamstow assembled in the schoolroom of the church at Stratford to welcome the Pioneer Preachers. The Hostel is now under the Wardenship of Dr. Tudor Jones, and the five preachers will, for the present, supply the pulpits of the three churches which united to welcome them. Letters of regret for absence and good wishes for the success of the new experiment were read from Dr. Blake Odgers, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, and Mr. Moseley, of the Forest Gate Church. Dr. Tudor Jones, who occupied the chair, expressed the feelings of those present in a cordial speech, and recalled some incidents of his own life relating to the change of his religious beliefs, which had created more difficulties for him as a Calvinistic Methodist than the young preachers whom they were welcoming had to face. He believed that they had a great work before them, and he rejoiced in their courage, and in the fact that they stood for something other than the intellectual life. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, minister of the London District Unitarian Society; Mr. W. J. Noel, the secretary of the church at Stratford; Mr. Alfred Wilson, the Rev. A. H. Biggs (Ilford), Mr. W. H. Morris (Walthamstow), Mr. Stables (Forest Gate), Mr. Causebrooke, who welcomed the preachers on behalf of the local branch of the Liberal Christian League, Mr. E. Fyson, on behalf of the London Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union, and Mr. Macpherson (Plaistow) also spoke. The three Pioneer Preachers who were present, Mr. Fred Cottier,

Mr. F. G. Barrett-Ayers, and Mr. Stanley Mossop, responded, expressing their appreciation of the warm welcome they had received, and the hopeful spirit in which they were about to begin their new work.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE OTHER SIDE OF WAR.

Sir Adam Block has sent an urgent appeal to the Times from Constantinople begging for assistance on behalf of the Turkish refugees. The fierce fighting of the last few weeks has resulted in grief and misery to thousands of families, whether Moslem or Christians, in all parts of the Near East. In addition to these there are the wounded soldiers themselves, numbering many thousands, "whose state of suffering and sickness is beyond description." We grow accustomed all too soon to the sensational accounts of actual war which appear in the press, and people who would be greatly distressed if they saw an accident involving human suffering to a single person in the street can read almost without a pang that 50,000 casualties were reported after a five days' engagement. But Sir Adam Block's letter makes us realise more poignantly the terrible sufferings of the Turkish refugees, which can only be mitigated if a generous response is made to the demands upon our sympathy and charity.

* * *

A description is given of the long strings of rude four-wheel carts carrying whole families to Asia Minor. For these people there is no return. "Their villages are pillaged and burned. In many cases they were fired upon as they left in carts or in boats, and so great was their panic, and the hurry of their exodus, that there are cases where women have come away without their children and where children have escaped in the general rush without their parents," who have no means of finding them. Many of these wanderers have dropped by the wayside and will never be heard of again; all of them are in a wretched plight, and have little to cover them, and scarcely anything to eat. Their patience is the most wonderful thing about them. They blame no one, and make no outcry. "They say little at all, only wondering what the next misfortune is to be." Cholera is now making ravages in their ranks, and the severities of winter must shortly overtake them, with what harrowing results can be easily imagined. Shall we do nothing, in the name of our common humanity, to help these suffering people?

MENTALLY DEFECTIVE CHILDREN.

It was reported at a meeting of the Education Committee of the London County Council a week ago that in the last two years the number of mentally defective children for whom accommodation in the schools is required had increased by 795. This was probably due to a large extent to the development of the medical inspection of elementary school-children. It was recommended that additional accommodation should be provided for these children by means of 40 places in a new school in Hammersmith; 65 places in a new school in North Paddington; 115 places in a new school in Hoxton; 65 places in a new school in Bethnal-green; 50 places in a new school in Lewisham; 150 places in Deptford; and 25 places in Wandsworth.

THE PEACE SOCIETY.

The secretary of the Peace Society, Dr. W. Evans Darby, writes to us to explain that the state of the funds, owing to multiplied appeals in all directions, does not permit the Society to send the usual personal invitation to observe Peace Sunday, which falls on December 22, direct to all ministers as in former years. We therefore desire to call attention to the observance, which will have a special significance this year in view of the unsettled state of Europe and the responsibility which is laid upon Great Britain to maintain peaceable relations with other countries. Literature for personal use and information will be sent free on application to the Secretary of the Peace Society, 47, New Broad-street, E.C.

SIR L. ALMA-TADEMA'S HOUSE.

The idea of acquiring for the nation Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema's house in St. John's Wood, which has been described as the most beautiful house in London, has been revived, and as it is now in the market we hope that a real effort will be made to secure it. The bronze frame of the entrance hall is cast from that of the house of Eumachia in Pompeii, and the private library and writing room is built as the Atrium of a Roman house, with Impluvium, marble fountain, alabaster walls, and a ceiling copied from one at Pompeii. The white panel screens in the hall were painted by Leighton, Poynter, Broughton, East, Rivière, MacWhirter, John Collier, and Val Prinsep. Lady Alma-Tadema's studio, in contrast to the rest of the house, was in seventeenth century Dutch style.

LAND-SEALING.

Attention has been drawn to the new regulation with regard to the catching-of seals in the open sea. We are glad to learn from the Animal's Friend that land-sealing on the Pribyloff Islands, as it has been carried on by the Government of the United States, is also to be discontinued. Congress has passed a Bill (by a unanimous vote of the Senate) providing a close season of five years for the fur seals on the Pribyloffs, where the methods of driving and clubbing have long been a disgrace to civilisation. Those of our readers who are not acquainted with the facts should read Mr. Collinson's pamphlet "How Sealskins are Obtained."

THE RABBIT'S NEW NAIL.

A very curious instance of the way in which species are modified in accordance with their needs is furnished by W. G. Jordan in "The Kingship of Self-Control," to which the Animals' Friend draws attention. "About forty-five years ago three pairs of enterprising rabbits were introduced into Australia. To-day, the increase of these six immigrants may be counted by millions. They became a pest to the country. Fortunes have been spent to exterminate them. Wire fences many feet high and thousands of miles long have been built to keep out the invaders. The rabbits had to fight awful odds to live, but they have now outwitted man. They have developed a new nail—a long nail by which they can retain their hold on the fence while climbing. With this same nail they can burrow six or eight inches under the netting, and thus enter the fields that mean food and life to them. They are now laughing at man. Reserve power has vitalised for these rabbits latent possibilities, because they did not tamely accept their conditions, but in their struggle to live, learned how to live."

TEMPERANCE IN THE ARMY.

The Royal Army Temperance Association, which is carrying on such a useful work in every military station throughout the Empire, sends us some interesting figures which indicate the remarkable change that has taken place in the morale of the Army during the last thirty years. Surgeon-General Gubbins, Director-General A.M.S., states:—"Enormous reductions have taken place in regard to invaliding and sickness. In 1889, 688 men were admitted to hospital with delirium tremens, and in 1910 they numbered only 37!" General Sir John French, Inspector-General of the Forces, speaking at Aldershot, said: "Eighteen years ago drunkenness was a very common crime, now heavy drinking in the canteen is a thing of the past, and crime has immensely decreased." The reduction in crime of all kinds has been no less remarkable, the numbers having fallen from 15,000 in 1902 to 640 in 1910. During 1909 no less than twelve prisons were closed because the numbers in prisons had fallen from 1,542 to 600! The Association numbers 60,000 members, and with its fifty years' record at home and abroad justly claims a share in helping to bring about this general improvement.

Aberdeen Unitarian Church. AN APPEAL.

THE Aberdeen Church Committee desires to reduce the debt remaining on the new church. It cost £7,000 in 1906, and £1,200 is still owing and hampering the work. For the loan of this sum £56 per year interest has to be paid. This is a great drain upon the income, seeing there is no endowment, and the members consist almost entirely of the working class. While in every other respect the church flourishes, the finances are a great worry owing to this interest.

The church members are always working for this reduction, and they are now making a special effort, by organising a Bazaar, to be held on December 20 and 21. They appeal to the sympathisers at a distance to help them in their effort.

The McQuaker Trustees have promised £65 on our ability to reduce the debt to £1,000.

THE PUTUMAYO: THE DEVIL'S PARADISE.

Travels in the Peruvian Amazon Region and an account of the Atrocities committed upon the Indians therein. By W. E. HARDENBURG, C.E. Edited and with an Introduction by C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With a Map and many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10/6 net. (Inland postage 5d.)

An account of the travels of Mr. Hardenburg on the Putumayo River, the great tributary of the Amazon, in territory disputed by Peru and Columbia, which brought to notice the terrible atrocities inflicted upon the Indians of the region by the rubber-gatherers. Apart from its value as an account of the incidents leading up to the exposure of the occurrences, the book forms an interesting description of life and travel in one of the least-known parts of the world, in the heart of South America. Essential portions of the Foreign Office Report by Consul Sir Roger Casement are included, the whole forming a valuable, if terrible, record of one of the most remarkable occurrences in the history of commerce.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

In the interval of fighting, during the arrangement of the preliminaries of peace, the curtain has been raised a little upon one of the brighter sides of the Balkan war. Pestilence has stalked over the stricken fields, but the simple deeds of heroism and love have followed in its train. The worst horrors of the cholera camp at San Stefano are things of the past.

"In the past two or three days," the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes, "the dead have been got rid of; the refuse which made the air foul beyond words has been burned; many of the sick have been decently housed in the Greek school; hundreds of lives that would have been wasted are being saved. Into the concentration camp by the station something like order has been brought. The tents where the sick lie are now decent and comfortable. A large wooden building is being quickly run up. In a day or two another camp will be opened, and San Stefano will be able to cope satisfactorily with the stream of cholera victims which is pouring in from the front. Luckily the weather has become colder, and that circumstance is greatly in favour of those who are doing this noble work of saving the victims of disease."

THE heroine of this work of mercy, carried through in face of overwhelming difficulties, amid scenes of inconceivable foulness, where men were dying at the rate of 600 a day, is Miss Alt, a Swiss lady, nearly 70 years old. "She is the Florence Nightingale of this little place," says the writer whom we have quoted already, "and the poor invalids speak of her with low-voiced reverence. She is modest—may I say almost to abruptness?—about the magnificent work which she is doing. . . . But when one sees her busy, almost from dawn to dawn, one can only think that talk about it is useless. It is the highest heroism—and that will always speak for itself." Miss Alt's partner in this crusade of mercy is Mr. Frew, a Presbyterian minister and chaplain to the Dutch Legation in Constantinople. "Fearlessly he labours from morning till night, adding bit by bit to the effectiveness of the arrangements and the comfort of the sick. Simply and modestly, he, too, talks of his work. He has been holding the fort till those with medical skill and knowledge come to relieve him, and right gallantly he has done this difficult and dangerous work." The correspondent adds these closing words, which should not be forgotten as the Feast of Peace and Good-will draws near: "There is yet a great deal of work to be done, need still for funds."

THE Lower House of the Convocation of York has passed a resolution in favour of prohibiting the exhibition of pictures of sacred subjects at cinematograph shows. In doing so, we think that it was expressing a sound judgment, however difficult it may be to enforce it. The Picture Palace at the present moment is a booming commercial speculation, and it is eager to appeal to any sentiment, sacred or profane, which has money in it. But the New Testament cannot be protected from exploitation by vulgar advertisement and successful finance simply by administrative action. It is the people themselves who must guard their most sacred treasure from ignoble and dishonouring associations, and forbid the traffickers to return to the Temple. At present we believe the instincts of popular reverence are sound on this matter, but clever business enterprise is threatening to set the fashion in a contrary direction, and the loss of high regard for the holiest things in life may be of incalculable gravity.

AN important report of the Departmental Committee on the Night Employment of Boys in Factories and Workshops has been issued this week. The Committee are strongly of opinion that the employment of boys under eighteen years of age at night in factories is undesirable, and ought not to be allowed to any greater extent, or at an earlier age, than is absolutely necessary. This applies specially to boys between fourteen and sixteen years of age, when the rate of growth is most rapid, and when the conditions of life ought to be rendered as favourable as possible for mental and physical development. Their recommendations are in the direction of the minimising of the evil without any severe dislocation of trade, but the members of the Committee wish it to be understood that in adopting this course they do not in the least modify their opinion that the only true remedy is to abolish night labour altogether.

THE Rev. H. D. Roberts has just issued an important pamphlet on the Tragedy of the Woman Worker through the Liverpool Anti-Sweating League. He bases his argument for a Minimum Wage on the results of a long course of investigation in the Liverpool area. Here are a few of his figures:—The manageress of a shop gets 9s. a week; her assistant, aged 25, is granted 5s. Another woman “manages” a bread shop and keeps the books for 8s. a week. Riveters at a tin canister factory average from 5s. to 6s. a week. In a soap factory the average is 9s. In the confectionery business the average is from 8s. to 9s. Bottle washers get 6s. 6d. per week of 9½ hours a day.

On the moral perils which accompany this economic slavery Mr. Roberts writes as follows:—“What is possible for women and girls who earn, say, 9s. per week in a city with multitudinous manifestations of luxury and wealth? Have they not eyes, ears, yearnings, desires just like their more fortunate sisters? What does life offer to them on 9s. a week? Monotonous drudgery without beauty, without books, without ideas, without any pretty vanities such as a young girl loves, without amusement, without change, without anticipation, without opportunity, without the dreams of youth. They look out of their own dull lives, and they see all the beautiful things denied to them showered in excess upon others. Is it to be expected that they shall possess the moral strength to acquiesce quietly in the cruel inequality of fortune? They are only flesh and blood like the rest of us; flesh and blood, moreover, unused to moral discipline, or moral suggestion, or affectionate training. Can we wonder that such a young girl offers for a taste of the tantalising visions she sees everywhere around her, the one thing she possesses which will obtain it? The wonder rather is that so many put by the temptation, and continue to live decent lives of self-restraint and modesty on a starvation wage.”

THE Oxford Committee for Promoting International Understanding and Friendship has forwarded to a large number of universities in Europe (outside the war area) and in the United States the text (in English, Latin, and Esperanto) of the resolution adopted at a meeting held in Oxford a few weeks ago. The resolution, which was moved by Dr. Gilbert Murray and seconded by Canon Scott Holland, was in the following terms:—

“That this meeting recognises in the international character of university learning, and in freedom of access for students of all races to university teaching, important aids for the promotion of international friendship; and instructs the honorary secretary to forward its fraternal greetings to the universities of foreign countries, and the various federations of university students.”

ROBERT COLLYER.

MANY tender and gracious memories will be awakened by the news of the death of ROBERT COLLYER, a man of whom England and America had an equal right to be proud. Baptized in the Church of England, reared in Methodism, and passing over in mature manhood to Unitarianism, it was impossible to think of him except as belonging to the company of CHRIST'S disciples to whom the bonds of love and the soul's need of GOD must always be something deeper than the doctrines which divide. “I never cared for what we call dogma,” he wrote. Why should he, seeing he was never trained in any theological school and drew most of his spiritual lore from the Bible and the open book of human life and the deep well in his own heart. The first thing which brought any conscious loosening from the old moorings was friendship with LUCRETIA MOTT and the tidal wave of the anti-slavery campaign. But nothing ever spoilt the virginal freshness of his conversion, when in early life his first wife was taken from him and his stricken heart found rest and joy in God; and he retained the soul of Methodism to the end.

A great deal of the sunshine of his spirit is imprisoned in his books. His sermons with their flashing humour and tender humanity were himself, and even in the printed page they still throb and quiver like some living thing. But those who never saw that massive head in the pulpit, and heard the Yorkshire burr in his voice, and watched him while he played like some rapt musician on the keys of human emotion, may find it hard to understand the secret of his influence and the spell which his name cast over many hearts. There was never any effort to get into touch with the vital interests of men, as though they needed to be persuaded to listen to the good news from GOD. Almost before a word was spoken, with the first glance of his strong kindly face, he had passed into the souls before him and for a season he could do with them as he would. His humour, quaint and racy of the soil, was irresistible, and without a trace of speaking for effect he could use it to enrich his message. Some preachers have been known to make jokes in the pulpit, and their thin conceits were like the crackling of thorns. When ROBERT COLLYER preached a ripple of laughter might pass over the congregation like the summer wind on a field of ripened corn, but the next moment men would be holding back their tears.

The preacher's gift is one of the most difficult to analyse, especially when it owes little to conscious art or definite training. At its best it is one of the noblest expressions of human power, and voice and words are only the medium by which the hidden fires of genius are given to the world. All we can do is to watch the favouring influence of temperament and outward fortune upon an original gift which they do little to explain. In the case of ROBERT COLLYER we have his own candid and beautiful statement of a debt quite beyond his power to repay. He was born into a poor, simple and most loving home, perhaps the best nursery of all for heroes and preachers. “In the hardest times,” he writes in his book of Memories, “the dear mother looked after me and the whole brood. The home was bright always when the day's work was done, and replete with all the good cheer her heart could compass for us. There was quite the minimum of ‘Thou shalt nots’ in her tables of the law. She gave us our heads and held on to our hearts, and all was well. Dr. BELLINGS was introduced to her on his last visit to England. She was then far on in years, and the first time I met him after his return he said to me, ‘I know where you got your outfit. I saw your mother in Leeds.’” This home was set in surroundings which drew out all the latent poetry of his heart. He roamed over the moors in his boyhood. He belonged to the Yorkshire dales, where low and warm the hamlets lie,

Each with its little plot of sky and little lot of stars.

And to match these sturdy surroundings he had the gift of splendid health. Physical vigour ran in his veins. “We children grew up healthy and strong, living to a good old age; while I myself have never been one day sick in my bed in these fourscore years or as far as I can remember had my breakfast there”—such is his startling confession. In its suggestion of a close relation between healthy physical contact with the world and clearness of spiritual vision it recalls some pregnant words in one of R. L. NETTLESHIP'S letters: “How everything may be summed up as ‘health’! Did it ever strike you that CHRIST was never ‘ill,’ and that he could go to sleep in a storm, as SKOBELEFF could do in a battle?”

Many men have had these gifts of an austere but kindly fortune, who have lived to be criminals, but by the grace of God—no other phrase expresses the luminous mystery of it all so well—they became in the hands of ROBERT COLLYER an essential part of his equipment as a preacher, and with their aid he turned many to righteousness. In no direction is their influence so clear as in his deeply human handling of the New Testament. At his bidding, all its motley array of characters, so sadly trimmed and depressed to suit the theological proprieties, became instinct with the inexhaustible humours of life, and the central Figure of all rose again in the eternal freshness of his humanity, a Saviour who really saves by giving gladness and health to men, and a deep sense of Divine loving-kindness to dwell always in their hearts.

The anvil, where for so many years he plied his trade, and the pulpit are the twin symbols of ROBERT COLLYER'S life. It means much for modern Christianity, often so scholastic in its thinking and so limited by inert traditions in its work, that the heralds of the kingdom are still summoned from the carpenter's shop and the blacksmith's forge and from mending their nets upon the shore. For these men the world itself is a university and life the best teacher of wisdom. But we do them little honour, when we try to leap at a bound to the place where they stand and refuse the slow discipline of mind and spirit, because one in ten thousand is a chosen vessel of the Lord. The great comrades are given to us that we may practise their virtues and follow their example, but chiefly to encourage and inspire; and their bequest to us at their departure is not a method which we can never copy but a spirit in which we can always live.

"Then said he, I am going to my fathers, and though with great difficulty I am got hither, yet now I do not repent me of all the trouble I have been at to arrive where I am. My sword I give to him that shall succeed me in my pilgrimage, and my courage and skill to him that can get it. My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me that I have fought his battles who now will be my Rewarder. When the day that he must go hence was come, many accompanied him to the river side, into which as he went he said, Death, where is thy sting? And as he went down deeper he said, Grave, where is thy victory? So he passed over, and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side."

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THISTLEDOWN.

Acts of grace are wrought by the God of Nature as well as by the God of Theology. Only the former are much more general in their operation. Father Tyrrell disliked the idea of grace because it savoured of favouritism. But his objection holds good only to the fact of exclusive individual recipience. Nature's bounty is more widely and impartially distributed. A severe winter is being loudly and repeatedly prophesied. If such is our fate, it is a fate announced by a benign harbinger. For the warm, genial sunny weather which lasted a fortnight in mid-November, preceding the anticipated period of severity, was a veritable act of grace. The bees have buzzed in the white betony and belated scabious and knapweed. Lizards have disturbed their hibernating sleep to bask in the unexpected sunshine. Squirrels have stolen hasty romps on the leafless oaks. Long-tailed tits were actually pairing, and had the fine spell continued one would be finding the first foundations of their cosy-roofed nests. Pinks and roses and violas have persisted in prolonging into the forecourt of winter the charm of summer. I did not, however, expect to see the stitchwort in bloom, but there it starred the hedgerows as though it were early April. A few wasps were about, and that may account for the blooms of the new figwort plants bending over the canal banks, of which blooms they are the sole fertilisers. The periwinkle, true to the habits of its Italian home (if tradition be correct that its advent formed part of the Roman invasion) was more in season, as it glanced with mauve eyes, timidly eyeing the passer-by like angels hiding till the storm swept by. In a single country walk, thirty-five species of wild flowers were counted, from the linaria festooning the old walls to the scorpion grass at the foot of the hedgerows.

My steps lingered awhile at Hoskin's cottage, where he sat at the door over which the winter jessamine was beginning to make a golden archway. Very sweet was the smile lighting up the face of the blind old peasant. He knew how the auriculas and primroses were unseasonably blooming around his feet. He could hear the buzzing insects in the laurustinus bushes. He could feel the sun, he could hear the twitter of wrens in the hawthorn hedge, the renewed sweetness of robin song, the haunting melodies of thrush and blackbird. He could smell the wall-flowers now making fragrant his sheltered garden. Last time we met he had said sadly: "The winter is terrible to them that's old, 'specially if the light of the eyes be also gone." But to-day he was smiling and his word was one of good-cheer. "Ah! this will shorten the winter." For though old and blind he is tenacious of life. He wants to remain in this world. Hades has no terrors, and Heaven no allurements for him. Through him still pours the red ichor of healthy vitality. But I fancy he has his hours of acquiescence in the inevitable loosening of the moorings. As we chatted, the soft breeze wafted to our faces those marvels of slender aerial craft, the parachutes of thistledown. One of these airy, fairy things touched the rugged features of the old peasant and rose up into the light like an unspoken prayer. As it moved up, spinning, it seemed to symbolise the soft influence that kisses for a moment the hardness of human life, and lifts the heart up to the blue expanses of happiness. After the feathery caress, the sightless orbs of the old man were lifted as though to watch the flight, and one thought of that other tragic figure cursed with too much vision as this with too little, who said:

For double the vision my eyes do see,
And a double vision is always with me.
With my inward eyes, 'tis an old man grey,
With my outward, a thistle across the way.

To one with the inward vision, what is thistledown? Is it a little fancy of a dreaming god? Is it a silken caress escaped from the touch of some angel of mercy? Is it an unformed wish of a spirit of the land where love is king? How does its touch on the skin make vital resurrection of the eternal child sleeping in the heart of all of us with folded wings? How does it release the hidden springs of gladness in the subconscious life? How stir the faculty known to the lad who said: "I never dream because I see it all awake"? Strange that the almost imperceptible touch of the silken pappus of a common seed should awake deeps that lie so long asleep. So slightly made that a few strands of a spider's web can break the impetus of its floating soundless motion. Yet it relates us to the unexplored fields of voiceless spiritual energies we have not yet made our own—the invincible gentleness that is to overcome all wrong, the forgiveness that is to blot out even the memory of every sin.

Soft fingers of unborn children of light tugging at our heartstrings in the gardens of God; repressed hopes, impossible ideals, dreams of our youth unrealised. The wee shimmering argosy bearing its yellow cage was once embedded in the structure of the flower, held tight within the shaggy, prickly involucre, but is now released. So, perhaps, the imprisoned good which is denied opportunity, the gleam of beauty that is denied expression, the love that misses its end and purpose may win liberation and float out free into the domain of sunny weather, the vast blue expanses, where the gracious silence broods.

Is the summer ended, the harvest passed and yet we are not saved? Lo, before the winter arrives, come the soft days wherein He hath mercy on the old and the blind, and touches them to such fancies as fill the dimples in the laughing faces of the folk of fairy land.

THE ENGLISH VILLAGE.

Not long ago the suggestion was made by the Rev. P. H. Ditchfield that the National Trust or some such body should acquire a typical English village for preservation in its entirety. Already the National Trust has taken under its care some noteworthy houses and some characteristic bits of English scenery. But, so far, there has been no attempt to protect that charming collection of buildings, with their gardens and trees, which makes up the characteristic village, and year by year partly by the demolition of old buildings, partly by the intrusion of new ones, the number of perfectly picturesque villages is reduced. For, despite our modern science and skill, we seem unable to make new villages which belong to the landscape as the old ones seem to do. It is part of the penalty we pay for progress. When communication between distant parts of the country was difficult, village builders, perforce, had to rely on local resources. Where there was clay, bricks and tiles were used; in the wooded parts, timber framing was the natural type of building; and where stone was abundant, there stone buildings were put up. But now all is changed, and you may find houses built of imported bricks nestling under the shadow of excellent building stone; and cottages in a southern county where tile-making has flourished are covered with blue slates from Wales. The harmony of the old picture is destroyed. A stately volume has just appeared from Messrs. Dent's publishing house in which Mr. Ditchfield describes the cottages of some of our beautiful English villages. Mr. A. R. Quinton has provided illustrations in a long series of excellently reproduced colour sketches.* Mr. Ditchfield shows how these cottages bear the stamp of skilled craftsmen, and points out that the pleasure we find in looking at these houses is due to the beautiful forms and colours given them by the workmen who built them. The kindly hand of time has, doubtless, helped to arrange the picture, but it is on craft-work that time's softening touch really tells.

It seems to us that Mr. Ditchfield and sundry other writers, to whom we owe an equal debt for the zeal with which they have noted the beauties of the country side, go wrong when they bewail the modern spirit which finds expression in Public Health Acts and the like. True, the district sanitary inspector will condemn a damp cottage regardless of the fact that it was built while Queen Bess was on the throne, or that it is the best example of timber framing to be found in a day's march. But houses were made for people to live in, and they do not serve their purpose unless they help to a healthy life. Even though, as Mr. Ditchfield avers, the rural labourers dislike the new sanitary dwellings to which they are forced, and complain that they are not homelike, the fault does not lie with the Government responsible for public health legislation, nor with the radical councillors who see that the laws are enforced. The fault lies with those who enclosed the commons, those who filched from the labourer the holding which gave him a kind of independence, who pay him a miserable wage for a long week of arduous toil. These things Mr. Ditchfield mentions but briefly, yet there lies not only the cause of the depopulation of the country side, but, what is more to the point at the moment, the cause of the deterioration in building crafts in the villages.

The old cottage was small and of simple plan, but it was well built or it would not be standing to-day after two or three hundred years have passed. And, as Mr. Ditchfield shows, it is often decorated, now with carving of door posts or barge boards, now with herring-boned brickwork, in a way which tells us that the craftsman who built it gave time and thought to his work. But the craftsmen of those days had to live by their labour, and it therefore follows that those for whom they built the cottages were able to pay for the work done. The field labourer of to-day, with a money wage much the same as that of his great-grandfather in spite of increased cost of living, with no land of his own, and often without any share in common rights, is patently unable to employ skilled craftsmen to build for him. We cannot but believe, then, that it is the poor economic position of the agricultural worker which is really responsible for the decay of the village, and we welcome the growing interest in the social conditions of rural districts as the first step towards improvement. Not that we expect to see an immediate building of houses suited to modern needs, yet exhibiting the qualities of fine craftsmanship, following an improvement of the economic condition of the labourer. The village craftsman, unemployed at home, has gone elsewhere, usually to join the ranks of those whose task it is to tend machines in town factories and workshops. But we believe that when there is again on the countryside a population who can employ the craftsman, that craftsmanship will again revive in the villages, with increased power, too, through the new resources available. That time is not yet, and we, therefore, although differing from Mr. Ditchfield's outlook on social politics, agree with him that it would be well to take steps to preserve one or more of our beautiful English villages. He would keep them, unless we mistake, mainly as monuments of a glorious past; we, that there might be always at hand, not merely a memorial of what has been, but an inspiration to those workers, perhaps as yet unborn, who will "build Jerusalem in England's green and happy land." And, as we have said, their coming depends on the labourer being given the power to provide for his own needs, fully and completely, without dependence on the bounty of parson or squire.

UNHISTORICAL CRITICISM.

SIR,—Permit the entry of a protest against the airy way in which your reviewer dismisses the book, "Ecce Deus," by Prof. W. B. Smith, of Tulane University. It shows scant respect for the genius of one of America's foremost scholars, and moreover is altogether too brief a notice for a work which eminent scholars affirm to be destined to become a classic in its particular field of research. Such a thesis is not to be looked upon as the work of a critical mystagogue, and the fact that Prof. Smith wrote it is not by any stretch of the imagination to be taken as a tribute to Unitarianism or any other "ism." As a matter of fact, Prof. Smith looks beyond those ever shifting frontiers, and has a much wider vision of his great theme.

We admit that "The New Testament is a collection of esoteric writings," and we shall look in vain for aid to the rusty keys hanging from the belt of the professional theologian. Possibly the obvious prejudice in the mind of your reviewer is on account of the fact that the writer he assails was once a Professor of Mathematics, and now is a Professor of Philosophy. Your reviewer states that "Presumably it is due to an oversight that 'Ecce Deus' does not give parallels from other religious movements." It was quite unnecessary to quote such parallels in such a book as it naturally presupposes acquaintance with the subject, and readers would, or should, know something of Drews, Schweitzer, Robertson, and others. Again your reviewer states, "In view of Prof. Smith's startling discoveries, it is quite possible that he may yet recover what he requires from the Gnostics of the second century, for it is they who inspired the evangelists and Apostles." Now, sir, we leave your readers to assess the value of a phrase of that kind. Further your reviewer adds, "As for the sayings of Jesus, they have been assembled from every point of the literary compass," &c. He would indeed be a brave man who would dare to collect all the alleged sayings of Jesus and publish them over his own signature, with the title, "The Original, Authentic, and Unquestioned Sayings of Jesus."

Prof. Smith sets out to sustain his thesis in the following manner:—

(1) That the primitive Christian preaching proclaimed the Saviour-God, Jesus.

(2) That Protochristianity was an aggressive Monotheism, the "Eternal Gospel" of Rev. xiv. 7: "Fear God and give Him glory."

(3) That this Gospel was "veiled" in symbols, which represented the heathen gods as "demons," pagandom as a "sinful woman," or as a "prodigal son," &c.

(4) That its slogan "Repent!" means "Turn!"—from the Sin (Idolatry) to the true worship of the true God.

These are its cardinal contentions, and your readers should know them. Your reviewer dismisses the book, and leaves the corpse of its unfortunate author beneath a mountain of ridicule as his only deserving monument, and says as he passes out of sight, "Truly, if symbolism is another word for rationalism, and 'Ecce Deus' represents its last and most serious attack upon Liberal Christianity, then it is matter for rejoicing, since Liberal Christianity does not seem destined to fall to the trumpet tones of William Benjamin Smith."

May we crave from your reviewer a statement of the value of that nebulous phrase, "Liberal Christianity," ere we bury the body of the Tulane Professor, for it may serve as a fitting epitaph.

"Trumpet tones" indeed! Those who have the honour of knowing the learned Professor know him to be one of the most modest of men, and one of the most retiring.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY CHELLEW.

*Pendleton, Manchester,
November 26, 1912.*

[Our reviewer writes:—The review of "Ecce Deus" consisted mainly of an exposition of Professor Smith's theory in his own words. It is surprising, therefore, that a disciple of his should find his doctrine so hard to digest. The denial by Drews and Robertson of the historical existence of Jesus may be the last word in New Testament scholarship for your correspondent, but it is not so for students not less honest or critical. For Mr. Chellew's information, it may be said that a parallel to the Jesus, first God, then man, of Professor Smith's imagination, is not found in Gautama by the most eminent authorities on Buddhism. Again, in order to vindicate belief in Jesus, the Teacher, as he was most commonly called, it is not necessary that "all his alleged sayings should be declared original, authentic, and unquestioned," but it is necessary to apply to them a sober, historical criticism, and not to force them, at all hazards, into a preconceived theory of symbolism.]

"THE NATURE OF WOMAN."

SIR,—Books like that of Dr. Lionel Taylor will be appraised at their relative value if one bears in mind, first, that no man can fully know, and diagnose "The Nature of Woman"; secondly, that only a woman can know what womanhood is; thirdly, that even a woman can only know the womanhood of herself, and not of any other woman; fourthly, that no one knows what womanhood is as God intended it, since women have never had free development. The highest motive of the Woman's Movement is the timely, and divinely inspired desire of women to be trusted under God with the freedom to find themselves, first as individual human beings with common human qualifications, functions and responsibilities, and secondly as members of the female portion of the human race with qualifications, functions and responsibilities peculiar to their sex. The sooner and better they realise themselves as human individuals the better wives, mothers or unmarried women they will be. Who can even dimly apprehend the "Nature of Woman" (yes, and of Man, too) which our Creator is evolving, as each member of the human race attains more and more that self-realisation which is the necessary preliminary of true self-giving, and wins that equal freedom which is the needful condition of free-will sacrifice and mutual service in God's great human family?—Yours, &c.,

FROM THE OTHER SIDE OF THE WORLD.

SIR,—Having just read my INQUIRER of September 14, I feel moved to send some thoughts from one of the men at the outposts. The fact that our heads point in different directions from those of our English brethren may serve as an excuse if our glance at life and its problems be somewhat dissimilar.

My first "word," however, must be one of thanks and appreciation to my old friend, Harold Rylett, for his very sensible defence of Australians generally from certain misconceptions or misrepresentations. Were I fond of indulging in strong terms, I might well say that it is perfectly idiotic for travellers (whether journalists, lecturers, politicians, or mere globe-trotters) to rush round the few great cities of this vast country and then pronounce a verdict upon matters which they have hardly begun to comprehend. While claiming to be fairly observant, after having spent nearly thirty years in Australia, I should hesitate to criticise in the "cock-sure" and bumptious manner which is characteristic of most of our hasty visitors. Our Unitarian churches may occasionally suffer from this kind of thing at merciful intervals of time. Mr. Rylett is correct in his suggestion that Australians generally are Britons removed to a different climate and to surroundings which tend to a certain freedom not inharmonious with the development of a stronger personality.

My second "word" has to do with a very different topic, viz., "Death and Survival." It seems that Mr. E. J. Hunt has been moving the minds and spirits of several of our teachers by throwing doubt (to put it mildly) upon the belief in personal immortality. With an eagerness which I cannot admire, they seem to make haste to agree with their opponent that there is not, and cannot be, any direct evidence of the conscious survival of the change called "death." Forthwith, they tangle themselves up in a net of mere "words, words, words," neither convincing themselves nor anyone else. Can we wonder that the great faith in immortality is under a dismal cloud when even liberal or advanced religious teachers persist in their refusal to add to their faith—knowledge?

Unless I am much mistaken, that earnest and vehement soul, John Page Hopps, had to run the gauntlet of many half-patronising sneers because he took the trouble to get "direct evidence" of the persistence of conscious life beyond the physical change of death; because he knew, and said he knew, that which others were vaguely, if not idly, speculating about. For my own humble part, it has been a source of strength to be able to preach "immortality," not as a shadowy possibility, not as a philosophic dream, but as a reality of which any sane man may become convinced—if he will!—Yours, &c.,

COLERIDGE MEMORIAL AT SHREWSBURY.

SIR,—May I again be allowed to trespass on your columns to say that the unveiling of the memorial to Samuel Taylor Coleridge in the High-street Church, Shrewsbury, will take place on Tuesday, January 7, at 3 p.m., and that Mr. W. Byng Kenrick (President of the Midland Christian Union) will preside, the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., will give an address on the philosophical and poetical side of Coleridge's character, and Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge will formally unveil the memorial, and speak of the episode of "S. T. C.'s" visit to Shrewsbury. Also, that Lord Coleridge hopes to be present and take some part in the proceedings, and that we anticipate a most interesting gathering on the occasion. Lastly, that a very cordial invitation is extended to all friends who would like to come to Shrewsbury and associate themselves with our meeting on January 7.—Yours, &c.,

OUR fathers were so convinced that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing" that they were content that access to it should be difficult, and reserved for the few. But the growth of democracy in our time has made men realise that dangerous as a little knowledge may be, blank ignorance is more dangerous still, and that it has become necessary to "educate our masters." The publication in 1880 of the fascinating science primers, edited by Huxley, Roscoe and Balfour Stewart, made an epoch in the education of the people. Eminent men of science gave the public a sketch of the principal sciences and proved that it is possible to communicate in simple language a little knowledge of scientific facts and theories, which, though far from complete, furnishes a reliable outline which further knowledge may fill out, but will not discredit. In the generation which has passed since that time other series of cheap and helpful primers have been published, and in the last year or two quite a flood of valuable introductions to all branches of human knowledge have poured forth from the press.

Most of these later series comprise introductions to philosophy, a subject long believed to be "caviare to the general," but which is now, to some extent, popularised and elucidated so that the layman can at least get some notion of the problems it deals with, even if he fails to grasp fully the solutions which are offered. The writers of a batch of books just published seem to believe with Dr. Schiller that "intrinsically it should be as easy to make philosophy intelligible as any other subject. The exposition of a truth is difficult only to those who have not understood it, or do not desire to reveal it."

If this can be done by anyone it can surely be done by so clear a writer as the eminent French academician M. Emile Faguet, who, in his brief "Initiation into Philosophy," in the lucid manner which characterises the best French writers, gives us a sketch of the history of Philosophy from Thales to Renan. To accomplish such a task within the limits of so small a book necessitated a rapid glance at the teaching of most philosophers with a very concise statement of the most essential doctrines of the more important thinkers. For criticism of any kind there is little room. M. Faguet has striven, as he says, "to show the way to the beginner . . . and more especially to excite his initial curiosity." If the beginner has any taste or capacity for philosophic study, he will find M. Faguet's sketch both valuable as a "frame in which can conveniently be inscribed . . . new conceptions more detailed and more thoroughly examined," and so suggestive of further problems that he will hasten to consult the writings of the philosophers themselves.

If, with his curiosity stimulated by M. Faguet's moving-pictures of the course of philosophic thought down the ages, the student opens Mr. A. W. Benn's "History of Modern Philosophy," he will be made more thoroughly acquainted with all the chief modern philosophers beginning with Giordano Bruno, who, one is surprised to find, hardly receives his due at Mr. Benn's hands. Here he will find not only a fuller treatment of the views of leading philosophers, but slight sketches of their lives—illustrated in some cases by their portraits—a judgment of their personal character and a criticism of their theories. Mr. Benn's exposition is clear and interesting and his criticisms incisive, and though his rationalistic bias hardly allows him to do justice to the great idealists, except Spinoza, his criticism of Bacon, Hobbes, and Spencer is as trenchant as it is just, as when he says of Bacon: "The desperate attempts of some apologists to whitewash Bacon are apparently due to a very exaggerated estimate of his services to mankind. . . . Macaulay rests his claim for the highest place among philosophers for Bacon . . . on the new purpose and direction that the search for knowledge is assumed to have received from his teaching. On this view the whole of modern science has been created by the desire to convert nature into an instrument for the satisfaction of human wants—an ambition dating from the publication of the Novum Organum. The claim will not stand, for two reasons. The first is that the great movement of modern science began at least half a century before Bacon's birth. . . . The second reason . . . is that in modern Europe no less than in ancient Greece the great advances in science have only been made by those who love knowledge for its own sake. . . . And in our own day the greatest of scientific triumphs, which is the theory of evolution, was neither worked out with any hope of material benefits to mankind, nor has it offered any prospect of them as yet. The same may be said of modern sidereal astronomy. From the humanist point of view it would not be easy to justify the enormous expenditure of energy, money and time that this science has absorbed."

Such science should be sternly condemned by Mr. D. L. Murray, who, in the short space of 77 small pages, has given an extraordinarily clear and brilliant exposition of Pragmatism. Dr. Schiller truly says in his introduction that "Mr. Murray's little book may claim to be (within its limits) a complete survey of the field, simply worded, and yet not unmindful of due technicality. It is also up to date." The writer sets out by asking three questions: Whether the possibility of knowledge can be maintained against the scepticism of Hume? What is the place of the will in cognition? And what is the criterion of truth? To the first question he answers that James's Psychology proved that experience was not "a mosaic of which the stones were the detached sensations, and their washed-out copies, the ideas," but a continuum, which it is possible to analyse into sensations and the relations in which they are given. Concepts are ideal dissections of the perceptual flux, and "are discontinuous terms which have to be related by an act of thought, because they were made for this very purpose of distinction." Thus Hume's problems are unreal and the "whole conception of philosophy as aiming at uniting disjointed data in a higher synthesis runs counter to the real movement which aims at the analysis of a given whole." The contention of Pragmatism is, that we do not passively accept the perceptual flow, but furnished by our needs and desires with "first principles" which originate from within we analyse it and arrange the results of our analyses into what we call "truths," the value of which is that they are aids to survival and progressive life. Difficulties and perplexities force us to think, and the judgments we then form are "truth-claims," but these are merely formal and must be validated by experience or must "work" if we are ultimately to accept them. Truth, then, is not guaranteed by subjective certainty, nor founded on intuition. It is not the copy of external realities, nor an absolute system proved by its coherence. It depends upon the personality of the asserter, and is just those useful ideas which make for his survival and well-being. And not only is truth from the Pragmatist point of view constituted by the purpose of the thinker, but reality itself is what it is, to us, by virtue of a selective process, by which we attend to some parts of the perceptual flux and neglect other parts. "A selection conceived after the likeness of the heart's desire, the product of a human purpose"; and so, finally, "our world is plastic, it is most 'really' what we can make of it, and the process of our making is not ended."

It is a pity that Mr. J. M. Robertson's little book on "Rationalism" is devoted, for the most part, to a defence of Rationalism against the attacks of orthodoxy rather than against the far more subtle and dangerous attacks of Pragmatism. Yet in a few powerful words he vigorously defends the supremacy of reason. "Every act of reasoning," he says, "is a concession to the rationalist position to begin with. . . . Reasoning against the validity of reason is recognised as suicidal by all who can reason coherently. If reason be untrustworthy what is the value of reasoning to that effect?" And he maintains against the Pragmatist that "truth . . . means not merely 'that which is trowed,' but (a) that which we have adequate 'reason' to trow, and (b) that of which our acceptance is consistent with our way of testing credences of any or all . . . kinds. The ultimate criterion of our beliefs, in short, is the consistency with which we hold them."

MAURICE ADAMS.

SONGS DEVOUT. By W. G. Tarrant, Author of "Bee Songs." London: The Lindsey Press, 5, Essex-street. 2s. net.

SEVEN years ago we welcomed Mr. Tarrant's "Bee Songs," with that little gem "The Sweet Maid Spring" among them, and we are glad now to have this further collection of his verse. There are here over a hundred hymns and other verse belonging to the quiet places of religious trust and aspiration in a mind earnestly set to face life as it is in the world to-day. Some of the hymns have already found wide acceptance in the use of the Churches both in this country and in America, and future editors will find it worth their while to grow familiar with this book, and so to test the quality of some other of the hymns, which may well justify their adoption for congregational use. We note with pleasure the inclusion in this collection of Mr. Tarrant's recent contributions to the Boys' Own Brigade book of Hymns and Songs, and to the "Fellowship Hymn Book," and such hymns as "The Singers go before," "The Hymn of the City," and "The Master's Men." The verses which are the fruit of a visit to the Holy Land some years ago, "Galilee," "Capernaum," "Jerusalem," are also welcome, with their vivid realising of the actual scenes of the Master's life.

The first sections of the book are devoted to "Morning and Quiet Hours," and "Worship and Communion," another to "Revelation and Discipline," a fourth to "Comradeship." There are others of a like kind, but in these we have found some of the most helpful of the verses, especially for quiet companionship in times of private meditation and devotion, and it is in such use that we think this little book will meet with its warmest appreciation. Here, for instance, are the first and last verses of the meditation on "The Lord of Lowly Things":

When my heart misgives to see
All its little best can be,
Still that little best it brings
To the Lord of lowly things.

* * *

Common mercies, oft renewed,
Tell us daily he is good—Blessings all familiar, still Tokens of a great Goodwill.

So I bring my little best
When I know 'tis lowliest,
For my Lord, the King of kings,
Is the Lord of lowly things.

In the same section are the verses "As the Heavens are higher," and there are others we would gladly quote. But these must suffice as a token of what sympathetic readers will find in the book. If it is taken up in quiet comradeship with desire after the things that make life beautiful, with simple trust and the deeper vision of the Spirit, its true worth will be understood.

GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM: A MEMOIR.
By George Haven Putnam, Litt.D.
New York and London: G. P.
Putnam's Sons. 10s. 6d. net.

THIS is both the Memoir of a remarkable man and a record of the early fortunes of the great American publishing house which is connected with his name. In the latter aspect it forms an interesting chapter in the literary history of the United States, and may take its place side by side with the recent life of Alexander Macmillan among the notable records of the makers of books. Many interesting names flit through these pages, Carlyle, Emerson, Frederika Bremer, Margaret Fuller, Horace Greeley, Fenimore Cooper, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Prescott, and Edgar Allan Poe, to mention only a few at random. G. P. Putnam belonged to the old-fashioned type of publisher who combined a shrewd eye for business with a gift for literary friendships. He will be remembered chiefly for his services in connection with international copyright. He conducted a long campaign against pirated editions of English and other Transatlantic authors, and succeeded in impressing the public mind with the need of proper copyright agreements in the interest alike of writers and readers. But his ideal of a world-wide recognition of literary property has been only imperfectly realised, and there are still many vexatious restrictions conceived solely in the spirit of a protective nationalism without regard to the true interests of the commonwealth of letters. This biography, apart from its many-sided human interest, will have permanent value as the record of a long struggle and its partial success.

THE Animal's Friend, edited by Mr. Ernest Bell, has been in existence for eighteen years, and the bound volume for 1912 which we have just received shows no falling off in the variety and interest of its contents. The illustrations are as delightful as ever, and will be much appreciated by the children. Much of the reading matter is more suitable for the grown-ups, who will find the volume a mine of information on all matters relating to the ethical questions raised by our treatment of animals, and the legislative measures proposed for their protection. The chief events of the year in this connection are dealt with, namely, the passing of the regulations with regard to horses and ponies in mines, and the issue of the report of the Vivisection Commission. There are several Bills before Parliament at the present time, including the Spurious Sports Bill of the Humitarian League, and the Bill to regulate the plumage trade, which it is hoped will also become law, in some form, before long. Mr. Bell deserves the gratitude of all animal lovers for the part he has played in educating public opinion on these matters.

THE GOLDEN TILES.

As I walked down the streets of the City of Birds I bethought me how unlike were these beautiful mansions on either hand to those in the cities of men. Along these forest avenues are no ugly rows of houses built as like to one another as so many sugar boxes, which makes many of our streets so dull and miserable. Here, lordly palaces and lowly cots o' branches, all are different. Look at this huge tree rising erect and towering as the Eddystone lighthouse, while on the slope the gnarled roots of a neighbour coil themselves about the earth like the arms of an octopus. Here two fond lovers lean toward each other and embrace. There the British lion stands upon his hind legs ramping in vain endeavour to reach the unicorn, while between them rests the crown of jewelled berries on the hollybush.

One venerable patriarch bends his back low beneath a weary load of years, and next to him a stalwart youth of two hundred summers stands up in jaunty strength without a wrinkle of time upon his brow or a mark of toil upon his limbs. Yon stately tree is nothing less than a full-rigged ship upon the high seas. There the Archbishop of the Woods, clad not in white lawn but in sumptuous green velvet, extends his far-reaching arms in blessing over his flock. Look at this ancient grey tower of strength! As the pillar that sustained the Temple of Dagon, which Samson, laying his blind hands upon, dragged all to the ground, so does this single column bear up all the house. Houses like men, ships, lions—wonderful! And within these strange fantastic dwellings, once roofed with green tiles, but now uncovered by winter to our sight, what grand stairways, landings, massy beams and balustrades! Curved, sculptured, and coloured are they in choice, ingenious fashions so that all kinds and classes of the bird-people may discover cottages and castles to their minds wherein to dwell, wherein to place the restful cradles of their tender babes.

Every autumn a marvellous conjurer turns up in the forest. He is known as "Alchemist O." "O" stands for "oxygen," the name the chemists have given him, and he is for ever turning one thing into another. He professes to be able to convert them all into gold. At any rate he has a rare eye to beauty, and sometimes, if we are not on the lookout, he will play his fascinating tricks on many a useful thing which from our point of view does not always improve it. How carefully we have to hide our needles and scissors and razors (if we shave) from his keen eyes, for, like a mischievous magpie, there is nothing he loves better to experiment with than bright steel trinkets. Only he likes to turn them, as he says, into gold, making them, as we consider, rusty. Why, if it were not for Alchemist O we should not want half the drawers and boxes and wrappings we now require to hide up our valuables, nor should we need to paint our fences and furniture, our houses and our ships. The rogue, he is at them one and all, if we give him half a chance by leaving a bit uncovered. A touch of his magic, and there's the red gold.

Well, Alchemist O is not content with playing tricks on us, and leaving his smears of gold on our bright cutlery. He gilds to better purpose and on a grander scale out of doors. He changes the earth, he stains the rocks, he even colours the trees. With them he is especially active as winter comes on when there is plenty of water to mix his pigments in. He is a great friend of the trees. They give him notice when he may come and begin operations. Then he sets to work. He needs no brush. He does it by his alchemy. Heigh, presto! the little green roof-tiles are all turned rust-red and gold yellow, and then, as though they were really transformed into the precious metal and too heavy to hold on, down they come helter-skelter to the earth like the tiles from an old barn roof in a tempest.

If they were really flying flakes of metal, "patines of bright gold," they would not be left long lying on the ground, would they? Not while boys and girls have hands and eyes and pockets.

But look! Surely there is something in it after all. This must be Tom Tidler's ground, for there are the people picking up gold and copper. Here comes a man and a boy with a cart. They reach an open glade in the wood, and set to work raking the leaves up and filling the cart. They have fixed wattled hurdles to the sides and ends of the cart so as to make a high framework round it, and in this way they can pile up the leaves until they are as high as a load of hay. They must be precious or the man and the boy crazy.

But there, a little further on, are some boys with a barrow and bags. They also are busy with hand and rake collecting the fallen leaves and stuffing them as hard as they can into the bags, as though they did not want to leave one behind that they can carry. They tie up the mouths of the bags with pieces of string they have brought for the purpose, and laying them on the barrow rope them on, and wheel them home. Here, too, comes an elderly woman with her daughter and grandchild. They also are eager for a share of the golden tiles, and set to work as if they were determined not to be too late. They rake round about the trees until they have a number of heaps, and as they rake they chatter in merry vein. This is a very good thing they have come after. They have brought two large chaff sacks with them. Now they have raked enough together, so the grandmother stands holding the mouth of one sack wide open by a heap, while her big-handed daughter fills it and the little grandchild adds small handfuls too. When the two sacks are quite full they tie them up and loop a piece of rope round the middle of each of them. The younger woman lifts one of them on to the shoulders of her mother, who grasps the rope-end and holds it tight. Then she lifts her own sack up, and the two trudge slowly home through the wood, bending beneath their bulky, though not too heavy, burdens, while the urchin follows with a bit of stick in his hand with which he hits every tree he passes, running now and again a few steps off the path to strike one more. At home they empty their sacks into a shed and straightway start out again for more. Every fine hour they can spare they return to the woods, and no Liverpool broker or Manchester merchant could rake in his thousands with greater zeal than the two women, and the man with the cart, and the boys with their barrow gather up the fallen leaves.

What are they all for, these dry, rusty leaves, which are almost as carefully stored in the shed as coins are stored in a bank? They are not money, but they have meaning in life, which money also should have. There is no softer and warmer bedding for the cattle than these dry oak and beech leaves. Warmth, sleep, long sleep for the gentle kine and even for the serviceable swine during the long nights of winter.

And when the beds of the animals have become soiled and worn and they need renewing with fresh leaves, dry and clean, the old are not wasted but taken with care out on to the land, and dug into the soil, carrying with them still, yea, more than ever before, the wonderful power of feeding life—life, which having gone from them they can still give to other things.

It is night now. The animals are resting, heavily breathing. Quietly lift the latch and put your head in at the cowshed door. The air within is warm and soft with the comfortable vapour of sweet breath. On these dark November nights that begin so early, men, women and children are mostly indoors after milking and feeding. The glow of lamp and fire shines through the blinds of the small cottage windows. One by one these go out, and lesser lights appear in the bedroom windows above, about the time the great folk in London are having their dinner or going to the play. Then these are extinguished, and all is dark. No, the candles of heaven are lit in the vast, dark sky, which stretches over our heads like the branches of a colossal tree with leaves not of bronze or gold but of burnished silver.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

ROBERT COLLYER.

It is with gratitude and praise rather than with the note of sorrow that we would record the close of the earthly life of Robert Collyer. He was a noble gift lent to this earth for nearly 90 years. It is not fitting to lament when he passes home to God. Some reference is made to his special characteristics as man and preacher in another article; here we need only attempt a short and plain record of his career. He was born in 1823 at Keighley in Yorkshire. His father was a blacksmith, in steady work at a modest wage, and all the boy's early memories, to which he clung with passionate attachment through life, were of the simple dignity of toil, the tender affection of his parents, and the keen edge which is added to the smallest pleasures when it is hard to make both ends meet. His short school days were followed in 1831 by child-labour in the factory, "thirteen hours a day, five days in the week, and eleven on the Saturday—rung in at six in the morning and out at eight in the evening, with an hour for dinner and a rest." The Factory Act of 1834 mitigated the severity of these conditions. Many years afterwards the factory bell which used to waken him in the morning was presented to him as a memorial of the old days, and was given by him to Cornell University. But the factory was only a stop-gap till he was old enough to be apprenticed to his father's trade, and he went to serve his time at a forge at Ilkley. The years which followed, till he went to America in 1850, were filled with the work of a labouring man, seasoned by a passion for reading—he was always of the elect race of book-lovers—and a sense of growing influence and dignity as a Methodist local preacher. When he crossed the Atlantic it was to practise his trade under the more favourable conditions of a new country. He found work at Philadelphia, and entered once again into close association with the local Methodists. But something uncompromisingly broad in his human sympathies and a feeling of moral repulsion against the doctrine of an eternal hell gradually sapped this relationship. In 1859 his official connection with Methodism ceased, and under the influence of Dr. Furness he entered into fellowship with Unitarians, not, it would appear, on account of any very definite doctrinal change, but chiefly from the desire to find "a large place."

In 1859 Robert Collyer entered the regular ministry, first as a missionary to the poor in Chicago, and then as minister of a new Unitarian church on the north side of the city. He remained in Chicago for 20 years. The chief events of this period were the terrible struggle between North and South, the building of the new church opened in 1869, its destruction in the great fire, when he lost his home and his beloved books, and its rebuilding. All this he has told in the beautiful pages of his book of Memories. In 1878 he was invited to the Church of the Messiah in New York, where he remained, exercising a ministry of broad humanity and splendid power over all sorts and conditions of men and women, till old age came gently on and made him willing to rest.

Robert Collyer never lost his close and affectionate relations with the land of his birth. His visits were looked forward to eagerly, and in later years might be likened to triumphal progresses of honour and affection. In 1871 he preached at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Essex-street Chapel, and won a secure place in English hearts by his sermons in London and elsewhere. In 1907, on the occasion of his last visit, he received the honorary degree of Litt.D. from the University of Leeds. His recreations have been described in words which must have come from his own pen as "reading, returning to his motherland, or resting in the mountains of New Hampshire in vacations when he does not cross the sea."

A PERSONAL MEMORY.

Surely the dear friend of so many multitudes of English-speaking people who has just passed away, must indeed have been of those whom the gods love, for though old in years and frail in body, to the last he kept the eternal spirit of youth. The most essentially human of men, Robert Collyer was one of the most spiritually minded also. His outward man, with his fine rugged face, glowing with loving-kindness and the joy of life, was the very index of his soul. With the heart of a child and the mind of a poet, what struck one most was his wonderful simplicity and the absolute sincerity of his bearing. To numbers over here he was known, and by all much loved, but to have known him at his best is to have known him as some of us were privileged to do in Chicago in the seventies. Twenty years before that Mr. Collyer had come to the city to take up the duties of a minister at large. He had only lately left the Methodists, and he was still unknown. Chicago was only in the making in those early days. There are many still alive who could remember it as simply a trading fort, and some who could even point out the spot where the Indian Massacre of 1814 had taken place.

Robert Collyer grew with the growth of the city, and before long a large congregation had gathered about him, and presently Unity Church was built. To this church came all that was finest and best in the intellectual and social life of the city, and round it grew up many a noble institution. Physically and mentally overtopping most of his neighbours, he came to hold a unique place in the city of his adoption, and in the heart of his fellow citizens and all the country round. As a preacher he had probably no rivals; at that time, as a lecturer few. A sincere and outspoken Unitarian, his finest work and widest sphere of influence lay among people who heard him most gladly, and who were absolutely indifferent as to what particular denomination he belonged.

To his brother ministers and fellow-countrymen he was a loyal friend and neighbour, and to us all the ever welcome and delightful guest, whose figure stands out most clearly of any in the memories of those bygone years. Of nothing in his career was Robert Collyer so proud as of his working-man days, and nothing pleased him so much as to be able to turn them to good account. When his church in Chicago was burnt down in the great fire, the students of Cornell offered him one thousand dollars towards its rebuilding if he would make them a horse shoe. Mr. Collyer's hand had not lost its cunning, and the horse shoe was duly made, and stamped with his name, and became the precious possession of Cornell University.

MISS CLARA C. PHILPOT.

THOSE of our readers who frequented the Book Room of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Norfolk-street, and in the earlier years at Essex Hall, will regret to learn that Miss Philpot died suddenly on Sunday morning, December 1, at her residence in Hampstead Way, at the age of 68. Clara Clark Philpot lost both father and mother comparatively early in life. She possessed the gift of making friends, and visitors to the Book Room received from her the most considerate and kindly welcome. She was herself a lover of books, and she had the power of interesting others in what she had read. Never very robust, she found the strain of business hours and work too much for her strength. For several years she lived quietly at Tunbridge Wells, latterly along with her close friend, Miss Dodd, at the Hampstead Garden Suburb. Miss Philpot was an earnest and convinced Unitarian, and she always took a deep interest in the Sunday services. She had recently become attached to the new church at Finchley, and loved to be there. In earlier years she was a devoted Sunday school teacher at Stamford-street, during the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, and afterwards of the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, to whose family she was warmly attached. Always gentle and affectionate, she was never lacking in courage, and could give a good account of her political or religious principles and beliefs.

A memorial service was held in the Chapel, Golders Green Crematorium, on Wednesday, December 4, conducted by the Rev. Copeland Bowie, who in words of appreciation and sympathy spoke of Miss Philpot's gentle, helpful, and trustful life, and its influence on those who knew and loved her. There were present at the service representatives of the congregations at Stamford-street, Tunbridge Wells, and Finchley, along with personal friends, including Dr. and Mrs. Lawson Dodd, Miss Dodd, Dr. Blake Odgers, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, Mrs.

Copeland Bowie, Mrs. H. B. Lawford, Miss Spears, Mr. A. A. Tayler, and Mr. W. S. Taylor.

SURGEON-COLONEL H. MARTINEAU GREENHOW.

THE death is announced, in The Times, of Surgeon-Colonel Henry Martineau Greenhow, which took place at Esher on Tuesday, November 26, in his 84th year.

He was the elder son of the late T. M. Greenhow, M.D., F.R.C.S., for many years senior surgeon of the Newcastle-on-Tyne Infirmary, and only brother of Judge Greenhow, of the County Courts of Leeds and Wakefield. His mother was Miss Elizabeth Martineau, eldest sister of the late Harriet Martineau, the authoress, and Dr. Martineau. He formed one of the original garrison in the siege of Lucknow during the Indian Mutiny, and on the night of Havelock's relief he rode out and brought safely into the garrison several soldiers of the relieving force who, badly wounded and unable to move, were lying completely exposed to the enemy's fire; for this act he was strongly recommended for the V.C., which was only withheld in consequence of technical difficulties. He was twice mentioned in despatches, and for his services received the medal and two clasps and the year's service, being one of four assistant surgeons, including Sir Joseph Fayrer, who were promoted to be brevet-surgeons "in consideration of their services during the siege of Lucknow." This was the first occasion on which the honour was awarded. In 1871 he married Jessie, youngest daughter of Mr. T. Lombe Taylor, of Starston-place, Norfolk, and leaves one son and one daughter.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

GERMAN NOTES.

THE CASE OF PASTOR TRAUB.—INDIGNATION IN LIBERAL CIRCLES.—HARNACK'S PAMPHLET—A PETITION TO THE EMPEROR.

THE following particulars relating to the affairs of Pfarrer Traub may be of interest to liberal religious thinkers in England. On September 14 the Presbytery of the Reinoldigemeinde in Dortmund sent a petition to the Prussian Secretary of State, asking for a revision of the case. The reply came early in October, declaring that the matter does not come within the province of the Ministry. On September 16 the Bund Deutscher Protestanten was proclaimed at Dortmund with Herr Schrader as President and Gottfried Traub as Director. This Union is to join into one organisation all the Liberal Church Associations of Germany. Herr Schrader appeals in stirring words for contributions to a Protestantenfund which is to help to win new adherents and to assist those who suffer on account of their labours for a free Protestantism.

The meetings of Dortmund in honour of Traub were of the most enthusiastic nature.

Four different halls had to be taken and Traub had to speak in each. He said: "They have taken away from me the title of Pfarrer—they cannot take away the vocation. The time has come to show that there is a vocation which is independent of the appointment by the Prussian Oberkirchenrat. This vocation no one shall take from me. My dear friends! Let us walk together as true comrades—let us keep a keen outlook here in our day and far into other worlds, but let us hold together. Thus we shall fight together, bear together, and win together." An enthusiastic resolution of confidence in Traub, of admiration for his character and indignation against the sentence, was carried with acclamation.

The recent Church elections in Berlin have been, with one exception, in favour of the liberal movement. Twelve new congregations were won over, either wholly or at least in part. These elections determine the composition of the Church Synods, but, unfortunately, not of the highest court, the Oberkirchenrat. Nevertheless, the result shows that there is a strong forward movement in the Prussian State Church, due largely to the sentences against such men as Jatho and Traub. A petition drawn up by a number of liberal ministers, belonging in the first instance to Berlin, and addressed to the Oberkirchenrat of Prussia, the highest ecclesiastical court, received 337 signatures. It protests against the unbalanced sentence of the court.

* *

Herr Ferdinand Jacob Schmidt writes in the Protestantenblatt on Professor Harnack's pamphlet "Die Dienstentlassung des Pfarrer Traub." He says: "Harnack's declaration is an important document, which helps one to form a true estimate of present-day ecclesiastical policy. In reading this burning speech, written with indignation held back with difficulty, one gets the following impression: 'It is difficult to understand that the Oberkirchenrat could condemn one of the ablest ministers on account of mistakes due to temperament—greater still and more fatal is the harm done to the Evangelical State Church and to the Oberkirchenrat itself. Many waters will have to run into the sea before the confidence of thinking men, shaken by repeated blows, can be restored.' Harnack goes on to say: 'The court unhesitatingly hurled at Traub the accusation of 'considerable moral mistakes,' basing it on material which, together with the situation which gave rise to it, may be definitely pronounced as entirely unsuitable to substantiate and establish such a charge. The severest punishment must not be inflicted without the surest proof. This proof was not given. . . . One can no longer be sure that it is possible to remain truthful in becoming a theologian, because the ordinances, and the management of religious and ecclesiastical matters no longer afford protection to truthfulness, but have instead become its peril.'" Herr Schmidt continues his trenchant criticism in the following terms: "In the growing disinclination which prevents the best and clearest heads among our youth entering the ministerial ranks, we reap the crop which has been sown. Our Church loses the heaven which leavens the heavy masses of the theological lecture-rooms with new spiritual powers. Is it a wonder if one trembles for the future of the national Church? Is one not bound to be troubled by the thought that the Church alone remains behind in the progress of intellectual culture? And do we not feel oppressed by the fear that our people's Church is becoming by degrees a conventicle Church, that she is becoming the prey of those conventicles whose religious culture remains where it was in the seventeenth century? Surely the Oberkirchenrat does not wish for that; therefore, it behoves it to consider in all important cases, not seven times, but seventy times seven, whether the result of its decisions is not such that it furthers indirectly and against its will those baleful efforts which seek to separate State and Church and the Church and the Search after Truth. How is this entangled situation to be unravelled? Not an inconsiderable number of men—men that have to be reckoned with—openly declare that a Court which has embarked on such a course must be fought with all available resources. This is surely justified so far as it concerns the energetic condemnation of what has taken place. But to go further seems inadmissible. A fight for the sake of fighting will only be grist to the mill of the opponents of a truly liberal Christianity. The great task of true religious liberalism is to prove unmistakably that its highest aim, not yet sufficiently understood, is the realisation of a strong national Church of the people. . . . The great renewal and deepening of the moral fellowship which springs from the divine power inherent in our evangelical faith, receives its perfect expression only in the creation of a national Church of the people. To bring this about is the task of religious Liberalism."

On October 21 the Reinoldi Presbytery sent a petition to the Emperor and King, praying for his intervention as Protector of the Evangelical State Church and as the chief guardian of the law in the Prussian State. They emphasised that "the sentence is one which commonly would only be pronounced in cases of moral depravity, not, as in the case of Traub, on account of overstepping in his journalistic and literary activity the limits within which he ought to have kept as a Church official." The petition, a long one, is a noble testimony to Traub and a moving appeal for justice. The Emperor's reply came through the President of the Oberkirchenrat, Voigt, the man who is held largely responsible for the sentence. It was to the effect that the Emperor empowers him to state to the Presbytery that his Imperial Majesty sees no reason why he should grant their request.

The Presbytery and other representatives of the Reinoldigemeinde communicated this decision to Traub in a letter which must fill him with gratitude and highest satisfaction. His telegraphic reply from St. Moritzburg, where he is recruiting his health, contains the following sentences:—"Law is against us, justice remains at our side. That which Sorrow and Joy, Labour and Struggle has bound together during years of experience and testing, cannot be sundered by force. God's blessing remain with Reinoldi for ever and ever." Gottfried Traub has been elected a member of the Presbytery of Reinoldi.

THE DEANSGATE LECTURES. SIR HENRY JONES ON REASON AND BELIEF.

SIR HENRY JONES, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, delivered the sixth of the Deansgate series of lectures on "Modern Religion and Thought" at the Milton Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday evening. The title of his lecture was, "Are Moral and Religious Beliefs Capable of Proof?" Mr. Rankine Finlayson was the chairman.

Sir Henry Jones gave his reasons in the first part of the lecture for thinking that religious absolutism, in succession to political absolutism, is coming under the appeal to reason, and that the people would demand that the elements of their religious faith should be submitted to their judgment, and should satisfy their reason, even as the affairs of citizenship. Mankind, he said, could not be free in spots, and it was the best test of truth and goodness on the one hand and error and evil on the other that truth and goodness could be universalised, while evil and error could not. It had been said that the religious spirit had another and better resource than reason. He did not deny that in trust and secure faith lay the very essence of religion, but he asked—How could that faith and trust be maintained? Were they against reason? Were they without regard to reason? Could reason give them no support? He was persuaded that men yielded the opponents of religion far too much; they yielded the central fortress of religion if they allowed to their opponents, and denied to themselves, the help of the formidable forces of reason. When would the Church of Christ rise to the same height of faith as Philip and call to those who doubted, "Come and see!"? He believed that it was because the Christian Church still denied the competence of men's reason to deal with matters of faith that it created distrust in the very principles that it would maintain. It was time that the Church should take a stronger stand. The laws which men would obey, the principles that they could accept, must approve themselves to their judgments, for the spirit of the times was setting on one side the fetters which had bound them in the past. It was necessary that the churches should take towards religion the same attitude as towards all the other great interests of experience, that they should give to authority, tradition, and feeling on the one hand and to understanding and reason on the other the same place.

Such was his faith in the truth of religion that he believed it to be a fundamental fact, and capable of proof, and the same kind of proof, as was practised in natural science. In the last resort there was only one way of thinking, one way of knowing, and one way of proving.

In the second part of his lecture, Professor Jones outlined more shortly the method of the application of reason to religious beliefs. After dealing with the views of some authors, he said that men were revising their idea of God, were feeling their way towards a conception of God as immanent in Nature, were taking the testimony of Nature to strengthen the testimony of the Bible, and were once more saying that "the heavens declare His glory, and the firmament His handiwork." In doing that the most recent theology was rising to the demands that the religious spirit had always made; and when theology rose to its task it, too, would find God everywhere.

Was it not possible also that men had not only been misrepresenting the nature of God but misunderstanding the nature of proof? In natural science and in philosophy men had been long seeking a final foundation for belief and had not found it. Were they not refusing to credit reason for refusing to do an impossibility? It was possible that it could not be found, for the very simple reason that it is not there. "The metaphor of a foundation," he said, "like many another metaphor in the region of thought, may have been leading us by the nose. May not truth be a system of mutually sustaining elements, and the more practical the system the less discrete, the less sporadic, the less disconnected it is? Truth is a system of interrelated elements in which every part sustains every other part."

"EAGER HEART."

60TH PERFORMANCE IN LONDON.

THE Christmas mystery play, "Eager Heart," makes its annual appearance this year on a larger scale than heretofore, in the fine Gothic hall of the Church House, Westminster, granted for the purpose by the Archbishop and the Council. This dignified setting will recall the first performances, nine years ago, in Lincoln's Inn Hall.

The play this year will be under the personal supervision of the author, Miss Alice M. Buckton, who has been absent for the last two winters producing the play in New York and Boston. Besides the independent productions of "Eager Heart" last season in some twenty-five provincial towns, the play was also given in New Zealand and in the Bengal Provinces, the latter by Hindus, who applied for permission to translate. Even more interesting were the performances given in the Greek Church, Boston, U.S.A., by the emigrant population of one of the poorest districts, the parts being entirely taken by Syrian youths with the exception of the Madonna's, which was represented by a beautiful young girl from Jerusalem. The dresses were their own costumes, rich with embroideries from Damascus. The performances created quite a sensation in Boston, one of the Harvard Professors undertaking an Arabic translation of the play for the enthusiastic Syrians, who wish to take it back to Palestine to act to their own people.

The dates of the London performances this Christmas are the afternoons of Wednesday, December 18, Friday, December 20, and Saturday, December 21, and the evenings of Thursday, December 19, and Monday, December 23; the last-mentioned, specially planned to fall within the holidays, will be given only if a widespread desire be expressed to the secretary.

All particulars may be had of Messrs. Chappell & Co., Ltd., 50, New Bond-street, W.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE COST OF LIVING IN NEW ZEALAND.

"The little heaven down under," like other places where material prosperity is less widely diffused, has had to record an increase in the cost of living during recent years, an increase so marked that a Government Commission was appointed to inquire into it. After investigation the Commission reported that the cost of living had increased by at least 16 per cent. between the quinquennial period 1894-8 and 1911. Assuming a fixed standard of requirements in the matter of food, rent, clothing, fuel and lighting, household necessities, domestic service and education, they estimated that the relative importance of these items is as follows:—Rent, 20-31 per cent.; food, 34-13 per cent.; clothing, 13-89 per cent.; fuel and lighting, 5-22 per cent.; other items, 26-45. The variation in prices for these different items over the period investigated is instructive and interesting. Rent increased by about 20 per cent. during the last fifteen years for houses of the same style and quality, the wholesale prices of food 21 per cent., clothing 20 per cent. (the cheaper qualities of boots having risen as much as 66 per cent., partly, the Commission stated, owing to the raising of the Customs tariff in 1907), and fuel 5 per cent. The cost of lighting decreased by about 27 per cent., while the cost of domestic service has at least doubled during the last twenty years.

CAUSES OF THE INCREASE.

The following are the principal causes, in the order of their importance, to which the Commission attribute the rise in prices:—

- (1) Increased supply of money, both gold and credit, and the increased velocity of the circulation of each.
- (2) Increased cost of production and increased demand for food-stuffs.
- (3) Rural depopulation abroad and slackened rate of production of food-stuffs.
- (4) Local combinations, monopolies, and trusts.

Other causes (less important in the view of the Commission) are, on the one hand, extravagant living, wasteful domestic methods, and deficient education; on the other, the operation of protective tariffs, the increased cost of distribution, and the rise in taxation, both local and national.

Among other ways of meeting the difficulty, the Commission recommended (a) improvement of education in all departments: general, technical, domestic, and agricultural; (b) increased stringency of legislation regarding commercial trusts; (c) the establishment of a permanent Board of Industrial and Social Investigation; (d) the abolition of Customs duties on all foodstuffs and the most important commodities used by the primary producers; (e) improved transport, including the abolition of differential rates on railways, and the introduction of motor trains, for the purpose of encouraging city workers to live in rural and suburban districts, and thereby reduce the rentals paid in cities.

Another factor in the situation, however, which we do not expect to find emphasised in a purely official document, is mentioned in a paper in the current issue of Les Documents du Progrès, entitled, "Has Compulsory Arbitration Failed?" by Mr. E. Tregear, ex-Secretary for Labour for the New Zealand Government. He maintains that the success of the compulsory arbitration experiment, so far imperfect, can only be made complete and permanent "when an education in moral culture and a general uplifting of the ideals of citizenship, have raised the spiritual tone of all society." In this higher and purer atmosphere, we doubt not, the problem of the rise of the cost of living would be easily and satisfactorily solved.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

THE Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Will you please allow me to appeal to those kind friends who at this season of the year are good enough to send me special help for the poor? I am in need of donations for the Poor's Purse and for Christmas gifts. I shall also be grateful for new or cast-off clothing, boots, books, toys, &c. Please send parcels to the Domestic Mission, Dingley-place (late George's-row), St. Luke's, E.C., and letters to 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, N."

THE Rev. W. H. Rose writes:—"Will you kindly allow me to make my annual Christmas appeal on behalf of the Poor's Purse and Christmas Funds of the Rhyl-street Mission? As we have lost several subscribers by death during the past year, I shall be very pleased to receive the help of all the old friends of the Mission, and I trust new friends will be induced to subscribe to our work. Parcels of new or cast-off clothing will also be very acceptable. Parcels should be sent to the Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, N.W., and letters to my private address, 32, Highbury-place, London, N."

THE Rev. R. P. Farley writes from the London Domestic Mission, 46, Bell-street, Edgware-road, N.W.:—

"I should be glad if through your columns I might again appeal to those who from year to year assist our Winter Funds to send in their contributions to me at above address. Contributions in money will be devoted to the Poor's Purse, the expenses of Christmas parties, and various classes which are held throughout the winter. Gifts of clothing and hospital and dispensary letters are also most useful and will be gratefully received."

THE Rev. J. W. Bishop writes:—

"Will you allow me to again make my appeal on behalf of the Willert-street Mission. Our need is great, the Mission being in the centre of a very large and very poor district, where there is an abnormal amount of sickness all through the year, in consequence of the conditions under which the people have to live. As my resources are entirely exhausted, I especially appeal for even more generous help than that given in former years, as there is every appearance of a hard winter coming upon us. I also appeal for cast-off clothing, and for help with our school of 500 scholars this Christmas time. For many years we have given a warm garment to each, if possible, on the occasion of our Christmas parties. Please send parcels to the Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester, and letters to 21, Polefield-road, Blackley, Manchester."

MISS K. M. ROBINSON writes from 32, Whitehead's-grove, Chelsea, S.W.:—

"I should be glad if you would allow me once again to ask for help from those who are interested in bringing some little pleasure into the lives of the poor children of our cities at Christmas time. The Noel Society has been in existence for twenty years, and a large number of toys are given away annually not only in London but in the towns of Birmingham, Manchester, Bradford, and Grimsby. Miss Green, the hon. treasurer of the London Centre, will be glad to receive gifts of money or toys (to be sent to her residence 14, Ulleswater-road, Southgate, N.); and I shall be glad to forward information to anyone desirous of knowing more of our work. I would draw particular attention to the distributions of toys, which are always a great source of joy to all concerned, and to which we would be glad to welcome anyone who cares for the happiness of the children of the slums. The distributions take place as follows:—Thursday, December 19, at 3 o'clock, Vittoria-place L.C.C. School, S. Islington (Christmas tree), and at London Fields L.C.C. School, South Hackney; on Friday, December 20, at 11.30, Popham-road L.C.C. School, New North-road, S. Islington. Help in decorating the Christmas trees and in distributing the toys is much wanted."

THE Annual Meeting of the Penal Reform League will be held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Friday, December 13, at 8 p.m. The chair will be taken by Sir John Macdonnell, and the speakers will be Commissioner Adelaide Cox (Salvation Army), Mr. L. A. Atherley-Jones, K.C., M.P., Dr. Frances Ede, and the Rev. W. F. Cobb, D.D. The business meeting for members will be at 7 p.m.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ballee.—At a meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Church, which was held on Tuesday, November 26, the Rev. J. H. Bibby, minister, presiding, it was resolved "That the best thanks of this meeting, representative of the Ballee Unitarian Church, be, and are hereby returned, to the Rev. J. H. Bibby for his strenuous and successful exertions on its behalf, in collecting the funds for the execution of the several works, in connection with acquiring five acres of ground, building new manse, renovation of the church, re-arrangement of burial ground, and alteration of sexton's house and other improvements to congregational property, and in paying out of his own pocket the deficit of £60, besides not charging for personal expenses incurred by him in the collection of above funds." Mr. H. Crymble, who proposed the resolution, said that Mr. Bibby had equipped the congregation with a very complete set of buildings, fitted with all necessities and comforts for doing good work requisite in a worshipping society. The Chairman gave a summary of the work which had been done since he put his hand to the plough. The present church renovation was the second during his time, as in the year 1890 about £400 was spent for the same purpose. The day of their meeting was the 29th anniversary of his ordination to the ministry of this his only church. Mr. Bibby expressed his great appreciation of the help which had been rendered in carrying out the work of the church by the treasurer, Mr. R. McMechan; the secretary, Mr. R. Caven; and Mr. Robert McCullen, C.E.

Birmingham.—It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of Mrs. Voysey, the wife of the Rev. Ellison A. Voysey, till recently assistant minister at the Old Meeting Church. She was taken seriously ill a fortnight ago and passed away after great suffering on Friday, November 29. The funeral took place last Tuesday at the Crematorium, Perry Barr, the service being conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood. The deepest sympathy is felt for Mr. Voysey in his great bereavement by the members of the Old Meeting congregation, his brother ministers, and many friends in different parts of the country.

Colyton.—The Rev. Francis Wood has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of George's Meeting and commenced his ministry on Sunday, December 1.

Cullompton.—On Thursday, November 28, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington laid the foundation stone of a new chapel to be erected on the site of the former place of worship, which collapsed after a storm on Sunday, March 24 last. This new chapel will be the third since the Great Ejectment of 1662. The original edifice was built about 1695. It lasted about 120 years, and was registered as a Presbyterian meeting house. The second chapel was erected in 1815. Since its demolition services have been conducted in the old school-room in Wayslane. The building which is to be erected will cost about £1,000, and the greater part of that sum has already been collected, thanks chiefly to the untiring efforts of the minister, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington. It is intended to seat 120. Provision has also been made for a school-room and vestry. The architect is Mr. R. M. Challice, of Exeter. There was a large gathering of friends from various parts of Devon and Somerset at the stone-laying, including the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, Mr. C. Taylor (Exeter), Mr. G. Philpott (Taunton), and others. A warm tribute was paid by Mr. C. Taylor, one of the trustees of the church, to the energy and optimism of Mr. Worthington, who subsequently laid the foundation stone, which bore the following inscription:—"This chapel is dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. The foundation stone was laid on November 28, 1912, by Jeffery Worthington, B.A., to whose effort and devotion the erection of this building is mainly due." We understand that the stone was laid by the minister (rather than by some "distinguished visitor") by the unanimous wish of the congregation, who felt that no stranger, however distinguished, could so fitly perform the ceremony as he to whose "splendid audacity" is due the great achievement of this year. If anything could add to the esteem and affection with which Mr. Worthington is regarded by those of all classes and creeds, it would be the courage and devotion with which he, a veteran of 78, faced the situation which awaited him here on March 25 last. To few men at that age is it given to initiate and successfully carry out a task which is no small undertaking for men in the prime of life. "Honour to whom honour is due!"

Halifax: The late Mr. J. H. Hodgson.—The death occurred on Tuesday, November 26, of Mr. J. H. Hodgson, a lifelong member of Northgate End Chapel, at the age of 60. For over forty years he had devoted his services to the Sunday school as teacher and superintendent. In the old days he was an active member of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Society, and his constant help has borne a rich harvest in many departments of the Sunday school and congregational work. Mr. Hodgson bore a reputation among his business associates for strict integrity and kindness of disposition. He was described by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, in his address at the memorial service at Northgate End Chapel, as "a man faithful in the little things of life, full of tender consideration for others, deeply loyal to what he thought right and true. He moved about very quietly. He was compassionate, tender, retiring almost to a fault, and yet of such power and personality that people who knew him loved him." The interment took place at Lister Lane Cemetery on Friday, November 29. Mr. Hodgson leaves a widow and two daughters.

London: Islington.—The Eisteddfod in connection with Unity Church was held on Saturday, November 30, at Essex Hall in the afternoon and evening, and was an unqualified success. There was a varied and comprehensive list of competitions, some of which, such as literature, cookery, photography, needlework, and art, had been decided by the judges beforehand, whilst others in music and elocution were decided on Saturday, preliminary competitions having been held in many instances. The two judges who were present on Saturday, Mr. Richard Walthew (music) and Mr. J. H. Leigh (elocution), entered heartily into the spirit of the Eisteddfod and thereby contributed largely to its success. Mr. Walthew congratulated the competitors upon the good standard of their achievements, especially with regard to the junior pianoforte solo. At the conclusion of the afternoon session the prizes were presented to the successful competitors by Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, and in the evening by Miss M. Tayler.

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—In the last of his four lectures on "The History of the Unitarian Movement," Dr. J. E. Odgers spoke of "Unitarianism in America." In the United States, he said, the history of Unitarianism was the history of changes in Congregational churches, which were, in the early days, bound by covenants whose simlicity contrasted strangely with the complexity of later times. To some of these old covenants it would be easy for a modern Unitarian to subscribe. These churches were, in fact, the "established" churches of their time, for the township was placed second to the church, and it was membership of the latter which gave the individual his civil rights. The one striking exception to the general rule in the development of Unitarian congregations was the case of King's Chapel, Boston—an episcopal church, which elected James Freeman, a religious liberal, to be its minister, and, finding that there were difficulties in connection with Mr. Freeman's ordination by the Bishop, decided to dispense with that ceremony. In 1785, by resolution of the congregation, all references to the doctrine of the Trinity were struck out of the Prayer Books used in the church. Dr. Odgers also dealt with the Calvinistic teaching of Jonathan Edwards and the reaction against it; the growth of liberal thought in the Divinity School of Cambridge, Mass.; the influence of Channing; Emerson's famous address, and the "transcendentalist" movement. The lecture closed with a fine appreciation of the character and work of Theodore Parker. On the motion of the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Dr. Odgers was thanked very heartily for his lectures.

Mossley.—The opening and dedication of a new class-room for the senior girls' class in connection with the Unitarian Church, and the re-opening of the church and schools after complete renovation and decoration, took place on Saturday, November 30. The additions and improvements had been made possible as the result of a very successful bazaar held last year, which realised nearly £1,200. A re-union of old and present scholars was held on Saturday, which was attended by over 300 people. The new class-room was opened and dedicated by Mr. Joseph Chadwick, of Oldham, an old scholar and still a generous supporter. Speeches followed by Mr. Dan Baxter, of Manchester; Mr. Jabez Rhodes, of Rochdale; and Miss Elliot, of Timperley. On Sunday the preacher morning and evening was the Rev. Percy W. Jones, of Doncaster.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—A public meeting to press for the early introduction of the promised Licensing Bill was held in the school-room of Unity Church, Islington, on Tuesday, November 26. Owing to the pressure of Parliamentary duties Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., who was to have moved an important resolution, could not be present, and in his absence the Chairman (Dr. J. Jones) asked Mr. F. R. Nott, of Highgate, to move the resolution, which was as follows:—"That this meeting respectfully and earnestly reminds his Majesty's Government of the promises made by the Prime Minister, prior to and since the last General Election, to introduce and endeavour to get enacted during the lifetime of the present Parliament a comprehensive measure of Temperance Reform, and this meeting strongly urges that such a Bill be one of the first measures to be introduced after the termination of the present session of Parliament." This was seconded by Mrs. Blake Odgers, and supported by the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, and carried unanimously.

Pudsey.—The sixth annual meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Club was held at the Unitarian Church, Pudsey, on Saturday, November 30. At the afternoon session a lecture entitled "Who are the Unfit?" was given by the Rev. G. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, who repudiated the application of the biological conception of the "struggle for existence," considered as one of remorseless competition, to human society in its relations and developments. On the contrary, he said, it was an established biological fact among species that "mutual aid" was humanity's true social principle. In distinguishing between the "fit" and "unfit" members of society, the lecturer laid stress on the duty of the former to the latter and made a closing reference to the Mental Deficiency Bill. At the annual business meeting in the evening, the report and balance-sheet for 1911-12 were adopted and officers for the ensuing twelve months elected. Information about the Club can be obtained from the hon. secretary, Mr. W. E. Walker, 155, Brudenell-road, Leeds.

Richmond: The Farrington Memorial.

The stained glass windows in the apse of the Free Church in memory of the Rev. Silas Farrington are nearly completed, and the memorial tablet is about to be fixed, ready for the unveiling ceremony which will take place on Saturday, December 14, at 3 p.m. Mrs. G. H. Edwards and Miss Roscoe will unveil the memorial, and the service will be conducted by Dr. Foat, the Rev. Hy. Gow, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

Sale.—The congregation of the Unitarian Church has raised over £400 as the result of a two-days' bazaar held for the purpose of wiping off a debt on the church expenses, and to provide the means for repairs and beautifying. Mr. H. P. Greg, J.P. (Wilmslow), performed the opening ceremony on the first day, and Mr. C. Sydney Jones (Liverpool) on the second. A pleasing feature of the proceedings was the presence and practical support of ministers and members of other denominations.

Stockton-on-Tees.—A sale of work was held in the schoolroom of the Stockton Unitarian Church on November 28. The Mayoress of Stockton opened the sale, and the chair was taken by Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P. The object of the sale was to raise funds to defray special expenses incurred in providing heating apparatus for the schoolroom, renovating and improving the organ and chapel, and other church purposes. The sale realised £70, which was sufficient to cover the special expenses mentioned. The Rev. A. Scruton (Glasgow) preached on the following Sunday evening to a large congregation.

Sydney, N.S.W.—The Rev. George Walters writes in his November calendar:—"Twelve months have not yet passed since the Rev. Douglas Price, M.A., formerly Rector of All Saints' Church, Brisbane, preached for us on his way home from England. He has since been conducting very successful services in connection with the Brisbane "Progressive Christianity" movement. We are now to welcome another earnest thinker who has resigned his position as an Anglican clergyman and has come into the ranks of religious freemen. The Rev. Wyndham S. Heathcote, B.A., will preach our anniversary sermons on Sunday, November 3, and will speak at the public meeting, to be held in the church, on Tuesday, November 5. The Rev. Wyndham S. Heathcote, B.A., was educated at Clifton College and at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1885. He was ordained in 1886, and held curacies at Holy Trinity, Richmond; St. Andrew's, Streatham; and St. Mary's, Southampton, under Canon Wilberforce, now Canon and Archdeacon of Westminster. He was appointed to the Vicarage of All Saints', Penarth, which was held until he went, at the invitation of the Chaplain-General, to the South African War as Acting-Chaplain to the Forces. After the close of the war, he remained in the civil church at Johannesburg until invalided home, and then, under medical advice, came out to Queensland six years ago. He held the parish of Rosewood and Marbury for one year, and was then Rector of Bundaberg for five years, resigning his position in July last."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE FOUNDER OF THE LAKE MOHONK PEACE CONFERENCE.

The death has occurred at Redlands, California, of Mr. Albert Keith Smiley, the American educationalist and peace advocate whose name will be known to many of our readers in connection with the annual Peace Conference at Lake Mohonk. Mr. Smiley, who was born in 1828, had devoted a great deal of his time for the past sixty-four years to educational work, and had given many libraries for the use of the public. Lake Mohonk, his beautiful summer home about fifty-five miles from New York, was the rendezvous of those who supported international arbitration and humanitarian ideals generally, and there the conference of which he was the founder has been held every spring for the last eighteen years. The delegates, numbering over 300, have always been entertained as his personal guests, and very important discussions have taken place with results which may well be regarded as incalculable. It is understood that full provision has been made for the continuance of these famous conferences, and that the estate has been left to the nation.

SOME LAST WORDS OF TOLSTOY.

Four years ago Tolstoy penned on a sick bed one of those simple and touching appeals to humanity which he never ceased to make up to the end of his life. He believed death to be imminent, and although the end was not as near as he thought, the ideas to which he gave utterance on that occasion remained absolutely unchanged, and he reiterated them later in his characteristic way. This document, which was handed over to his friend Tchertkoff, has just been published in the Russian Retch, and the Daily Citizen gives a translation for the benefit of English readers. The latter will scarcely turn to it in the expectation of finding anything novel or strange, for Tolstoy had but one thing to say to the world, "Love one another," though his marvellous genius enabled him to say it in a variety of ways so that it seemed to make a fresh appeal every time. But it is well for us to be reminded once more that the happiness and welfare of mankind lies, after all, in the cultivation of human sympathies and brotherly love rather than in the blatant assertion of individual rights and the demand for personal freedom.

"The life of the world," says Tolstoy, "the life of the whole of mankind, as it now goes, demands from you malice, and participation in deeds of lovelessness towards some of your brothers, for the benefit of others, which does not really bring happiness neither to others, nor to yourselves. 'But we are working for the future,' they answer. Why, then, should the life full of love at the present moment be sacrificed for the life of the future, which is absolutely unknown to us? . . . Let the fighter for 'freedom' or

'order' put one hundredth of those efforts and sacrifices which he gives for the struggle towards his ideals in the effort to increase love in himself and others, and he will see immediately, not as in his struggle, where results cannot be seen but only hoped for, the fruits of his hearty activity, not only in himself, but in the big joy of love itself, and also in the traces which this activity unfailingly leaves on other men."

PRINCE KROPOTKIN'S SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY.

Some interesting speeches were made at the mass meeting arranged by various labour organisations to celebrate the seventieth birthday of Prince Kropotkin early in the week. The chief speakers were Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Hyndman, and Mr. Wedgwood, M.P., and while none of these identified himself with all the opinions of the famous revolutionist, they expressed their warm appreciation of the self-sacrifice and love of humanity which had caused Prince Kropotkin to give up his caste and position to help the cause of democracy. Mr. Bernard Shaw said he liked him because he really loved the people, because he preferred living and working with them to being a Tsar's page, and he wished there were more men like him, and fewer like what they were themselves. Prince Kropotkin joined the International Working Men's Association in 1872. He was arrested and imprisoned in the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul in 1874, and came to England on his escape two years later. He has written numerous books, of which "Fields, Factories, and Workshops," "Memoirs of a Revolutionist," and "Mutual Aid, a Factor of Evolution," are perhaps the best known.

THE WORK OF MR. POEL.

Mr. William Poel, whose production of "Troilus and Cressida" is announced for this month, was the recipient of much praise at the recent dinner given in his honour. Sir Walter Raleigh, in writing to express his regret at being unable to attend, said, "He invented a stage where poetry can breathe and live," and this idea was uppermost in the minds of the various speakers who subsequently expressed their appreciation of his influence on the English theatre. The Rev. Stewart Headlam referred to Mr. Poel's work, which he had shared, in connection with the Church and Stage Guild, and said that the present generation could hardly understand the prejudice which used to exist against the stage. Mr. Poel had done invaluable educational service in promoting knowledge of the Elizabethan drama among the children and among the teachers of Lancashire. He hoped the time would come when it would be considered an essential part of the education of young men and women that they should hear and see a properly acted cycle of Shakespearean plays, and when there would be a school of acting to which teachers could go to learn what was right in pronunciation and production,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE few words, evidently chosen with great care, in which Sir Edward Grey referred to the forthcoming peace negotiations in the House of Commons on Wednesday, were highly satisfactory, and reveal our Government in the pleasantest possible light as the disinterested friend of peace.

“As the House is aware,” he said, “the five belligerents are sending their respective delegates to London to negotiate peace. . . . The choice of London was made by the belligerent States on their own initiative; it was in no way prompted or suggested by us; but we are sure the House will agree that their choice is very agreeable to us and their presence very welcome; and we believe that they will find the conditions here favourable to the conduct of their negotiations and to the conclusion of peace, which we all earnestly desire to see secured.”

IN regard to the meeting of Ambassadors which is to be held simultaneously Sir Edward Grey gave the following important information :—

“The Great Powers who are neutral and signatories of the Treaty of Berlin have now all agreed that their representatives in London should meet together for informal and non-committal consultation.

The object will be to facilitate an exchange of views, especially on those points which may most directly affect the interests of any of the Great Powers concerned. These conversations will begin as soon as all the Ambassadors in London have received their instructions from their respective Governments, we hope next week. They will not constitute a Conference; and in this connection I would recall that the first suggestion of a formal Conference came from Monsieur Poincaré, and Paris will, therefore, presumably be the first place to be considered should a formal Conference be found to be opportune and necessary.”

THE votes on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill in the House of Lords this week make it practically certain that it will be carried into law in the shape in which it left the House of Commons. We regret exceedingly that the opportunity has been lost of modifying the flogging clauses; but we have explained already why we are strongly opposed to this reversion to discredited methods of punishment, and at the present moment we need not re-open the question. All high-minded citizens will unite in the hope that the new and more drastic provisions will help to cripple the prosperity of this foul trade in human degradation; but it must not be forgotten that the middle-men, who are paid handsomely for the work they do, are not the chief agents. They only exist to minister to the vicious pleasures of other people, who never feel the frown of the law or the sting of the lash, and society will not be clean until it makes them feel the heavy burden of degradation and guilt.

WE hope that for a season the platform and the press may revert to the attitude of guarded reticence on this whole subject. The recent campaign of publicity has been necessary in view of the terrible nature of the evil and the stolid refusal of many sections of society to face these questions at all. But it has not been entirely free from the sentimentalism and the lurid melodrama, into which the English mind slips so easily in moments of agitation or alarm. These are things which clever and unscrupulous men are always ready to exploit to their own advantage. Already the placards of a certain type of newspaper show traces of the back-wash of the agitation, and the picture palace has discovered a new line in unhealthy sensationalism. Against all this there can only be feelings of intense repugnance. But it reveals once again the need of extraordinary tactfulness and a cleansing moral severity when subjects of this kind have to be handled in public.

THE facts disclosed in the Report of the Home Office Committee, which was appointed to inquire into rates of wages and conditions of employment among the women outworkers of Belfast and the surrounding district, confirm the rumours which have been prevalent for some time. It is established that the linen industry is a fruitful field for sweating; many women who work at fancy sewing and embroidery in their own homes earn anything from 2d. to under 1d. per hour. Much of this work is done with great skill and is sold at a high price in fashionable London shops. It would be wrong, however, to conclude that the Belfast employer is cursed with a double dose of wickedness. He is engaged in a keen business contest in a place where labour is badly organised and the conditions are highly favourable to unscrupulous competition. In these circumstances, legislative control seems to be the only remedy. The committee recommends that the provisions of the Trades Boards Act should be applied to various departments of work, which are set forth in a schedule, and this should be done without any delay. This extension of the principle of a minimum wage would apply to other places in the United Kingdom where similar work is carried on.

CANON HENSLEY HENSON has returned from the United States full of apostolic ardour for the cause of Christian unity. During his visit he kept a keen eye upon the growing signs of interdenominational activity and enjoyed a great deal of religious fellowship with non-Episcopalians without incurring any official displeasure.

"I cannot but think," he told a representative of the Westminster Gazette, "that within the next few years some effective religious co-operation between the great Protestant Churches will have been reached in the United States; and if this be so, the day cannot be far distant when practical co-operation will lead to closer unity. The effect of such developments in the great and growing sister Church of the United States cannot fail to have a potent and happy effect upon the Church in England. If the Act of Uniformity, which is the last relic of the infamous Caroline Code, could be removed out of the way, there can be no reasonable doubt that a great volume of goodwill, at present suppressed and therefore unsuspected, would be released into salutary activity."

A RELIGIOUS census of London was organized by the Daily News ten years ago. It has been decided to repeat the experiment during 1913, but on a much more extensive scale. The new census will not confine itself to statistics of church attendance on a particular Sunday but will seek to present a tabulated account of organized religious activity as a whole. It will thus prepare the way for a more adequate survey of the field, and provide the material essential for an intelligent judgment upon the efficiency of the machinery employed, the dangers of overlapping, the needs of the neglected areas, and possibly the lamentable disproportion between highly organized effort and spiritual results. It is intended to collect the information by means of schedules of questions which will be distributed to the clergy, ministers, and superintendents of missions in the London area in the course of a few days.

THE REPEAL OF THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

"Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all other liberties."—MILTON.

"THERE have been more prosecutions for blasphemy during the past year than during the previous fifty years. There have been more prosecutions for spoken blasphemy during the past five years than during the previous hundred years." These ominous words stand at the head of a leaflet which has just been issued by a newly-formed Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws. Most people are not aware that these laws exist. They have fallen into disuse or oblivion, and they might be allowed to rest in peace in the limbo of unrepealed statutes, were it not that misguided religious fanatics or the police authorities, in an access of zeal for public morals, occasionally flourish them in the face of unsuspecting free-thinkers. If they were really dead there would be no need for us to go about to destroy them. Since they are only in a state of torpor they should be given their quietus at the earliest possible moment. There are many cogent reasons for dealing with them in this drastic fashion.

In the first place they are simply a relic of a repressive code, created to penalise freedom of thought in religion, which has been riddled with criticism and sunk into a dishonoured grave. Blasphemy can only be a crime when there is a corpus of religious doctrine and habit which the State has agreed to accept and protect. It is analogous to slander and libel in the sphere of citizenship, and there must be some clearly defined concept of orthodoxy against which the insult or injury is committed. All this is quite foreign to the mind of the modern world. The word blasphemy has lost most of the rigour of its meaning, and is usually applied to violent or unmannerly speech about religion, which may stir us to personal blame or dislike, but ought not to be subject to legal penalties.

In the second place the idea of blasphemy and the lingering feeling of abhorrence which it arouses belongs essentially to mediæval religion. On the one hand it is connected with the imperium of God, and on the other it is bound up with a belief in magic and the terrible power exercised over human souls by the black art with its hideous travesties of religion.

This superstitious horror of blasphemy is not quite extinct in certain credulous forms of religion, but it has no meaning for the modern court of law. Perhaps the idea of a specially heinous kind of offence against the majesty of God has more reality for the legal mind; but it will not bear a moment's examination. The theology of mere dominion has had its day, and the belief that a foolish man when he uses blundering or evil words, which shock the religious sensibilities of his neighbour, is guilty of lèse-majesté against God has no possible connection with our trust in the Father of spirits or any noble form of loyalty to JESUS CHRIST.

The fact is that it is impossible to give to the word blasphemy any definite meaning at all, which will command the assent or respect of the ordinary citizen. The late Lord COLERIDGE evaporated its theological terrors into an offence against "the decencies of controversy." But what is "decent" in controversy depends upon our standard of education and our social surroundings, even upon the degree of provocation which we have received from an opponent. Who is to be the judge of these things? Is it tolerable that the scholar who dissolves Christianity into mythology should speak with impunity to admiring crowds, while the self-taught lecturer in the secular hall is fined for his indiscretions? Rudeness and indecency in public are always reprehensible, and indignation against them waxes hot when they outrage our feelings of reverence for the most sacred things in life; but the common law is able to deal with these things without invoking obsolete and oppressive statutes, which are justly regarded as a menace to our hard-won liberties of thought and speech.

We fear that some timid minds hang back, and refuse to commit themselves on a question of this kind, lest they should arouse prejudice among unthinking people or create the impression that they are indifferent where vital questions of religious reverence are concerned. But here as always courage is the true way of safety, and we plead for it in the highest interests of religion itself. Reverence may be described as Christianity's first law. Without it all our sympathies grow dull and the spiritual eye is darkened. We abhor all kinds of irreverence, whether it shows itself in slovenliness in the high offices of worship, or vulgar self-advertisement in the pulpit or the press, or the banalities of unmannerly secularism, or the cynical gibes of a shallow critic. But we do not want to punish people who are guilty of these things. Our Christian faith is no delicate exotic to be shielded from danger and attack. Let all the east winds of the world blow upon it, it will only grow in strength. Its shelter in days of stress is not behind the feeble barriers erected by a past age against the advancing tides of thought, but in the power of the living God; and it will survive to win men to a finer reverence and a nobler worship when every trace of religious compulsion has disappeared from our laws.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE TRUTH AND FALLACY OF A COMING WORLD RELIGION.

I.

SOME time ago there was held in London a Universal Races Congress. In the hope of many it was the brightening dawn of the Parliament of Nations, following on that Parliament of Religions held in Chicago some years before. In such gatherings we may see in visible and concrete form what Universality means and does not mean. It does not mean suppression or elimination of racial characteristics. It does not mean mixing up black and yellow and white races into a muddy mush of a humanity that never was and never will be. It means bringing together and comparing and contrasting strong points; it means mutual respect and sympathy; mutual helpfulness and understanding and the gradual attainment of a world-peace. It does not mean that the Englishman is to lower his life to the level of the most backward race represented at the Congress, but rather that there must be a levelling up, an upward lift of the lower to the highest, and of the highest to a still higher to be attained.

Similarly with religion. There is a false as well as a true Universalism in Religion, and it is easy to slip into a very damaging and destructive error. We are all Catholics now. We all seek a Religion that is "according to the whole," that is a complete totality. We need a religion that is for the whole man, head, heart, and hand, and for entire mankind. We are all Catholics now, that is we are all in quest of a universal religion. We find partial sectarian religions, religions with an exclusive spirit to be almost intolerable as well as intolerant. Nothing less than what is truly inclusive and world-wide can satisfy the modern spirit or appeal to the modern mind. But hundreds and thousands of even educated and trained thinkers in their eagerness for a Catholic religion jump into strange fallacies. A superficial acquaintance with the comparative study of religion—sometimes even a profound study—is responsible for one of the commonest of these fallacies. It is this. When some good people have heard a little about Buddhism and Mohammedanism and Zoroastrianism and so forth, they begin to talk somewhat like this: "Yes, of course, what we really want is to blend all these together into a universal world religion." I have known some of my friends quite seriously put it with unconscious humour in this way: A good cook takes rice from one part of the world and currants from another, and butter and eggs from another, and sugar from another, and makes a pudding. With the same eclectic impartiality we must cook our historic religions into a divine pudding. I confess that it does not seem to me a very appetising dish. That is just the peculiar fallacy of a vicious universalism—of a false Catholicism. It takes Christianity and puts it into a cauldron and adds to it Buddhism and one by one all the other religions of the world that have some good points about them; and then sprinkles over them a selection of the modern cults and fads, stirs them well together and boils them all up into a broth and then presents the ultimate concoction as the most universal religion we can possibly have. This, I venture to say, would be the most nauseous mess, the most disgusting liquor one could possibly brew. Buddhism alone would be an infinitely superior thing to Buddhism mixed with Mohammedanism and Christianity. In the mixture the distinctive excellences of Buddhism, the very revelation of God in Buddhism, would, as likely as not, not be heightened and intensified but neutralised and lost by combination. Tea may be an excellent beverage, and coffee another and cocoa another, and many like beer and whisky and divers kinds of wine, but mixed up together they would make an undrinkable wash.

This is not the way to get a universal world-religion, any more than the way to breed a Super-man is to marry a white and a black. Rather is it, I would suggest, by Buddhism assimilating, that is, making vitally its own the excellences of Christianity and Christianity assimilating and making vitally its own the excellences of Buddhism. That does not mean mixing or "syncretism." It is not comparable to a chemical combination, but (though still inadequately) to an organic growth or biological development. It is poles asunder from eclecticism. It does not mean mere "picking and choosing" with a view to aggregation. It is not a surrender of one in abject submission to the other. It means rather an organic and vital giving and taking, and that only by way of a stimulus and fertilisation in what is life-ward and spiritually fruitful. When the vital process is complete we may conceivably have a world-religion actually and geographically "catholic" as it may be even now in idea. For years to come, for generations and indeed for centuries, we shall see the action and reaction of various religions, and East and West influencing each other, and yet preserving their own characteristics. Only after men become more and more international, more sympathetic with other religions and other races, more catholic, less sectarian, will they at last recognise the supremacy of one religion, namely, that religion which by its toughness and persistence coupled with its power of absorption and assimilation has actually proved, in the arena of struggling and competing world-religions, the fittest to survive.

What that "final" religion will be is a matter on which prophets are free to prophesy—and I among them. But of this I must write more at length in another article.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

WILLIAM HONE.

BELATED biography inevitably presents a bleached appearance. The vivid colours of personal interest fade into the more diffused light of general history. William Hone died seventy years ago. The circumstances which interfered with the presentation of his full life-story do not seem very clear, but so far as we apprehend them they accord with the characteristics of that story as it is now set forth. The family took umbrage at the officious zeal of certain writers who hastened to make religious capital out of his conversion to orthodox Christianity—a conversion in which the family shared, indeed, but which they evidently did not want to be treated in this way. Thus the first generation passed away, and it is his granddaughter, Miss Soul, who has worked through his copious papers in co-operation with the biographer, Mr. Frederick Wm. Hackwood. There has evidently been no lack of materials, rather the other way we surmise.* Mr. Hackwood may be congratulated in getting through it as well as he has. The book is made more interesting by the insertion of a good many pictures, mostly reproductions from Mr. Hone's publications, especially noteworthy being young Cruikshank's amazingly clever caricatures. Perhaps a smaller volume would have been adequate, but as Burns reminds us, "we know not what's resisted."

As intimated, the impression conveyed by the book is not very satisfactory. We move in a constantly depressing atmosphere of struggle and failure, with only a few episodes approaching to brilliance, and these set off against some uncomfortable points of controversy. Hone's character, however, emerges respectably from the sifting of the dusty relics of an age that is not far enough away to have become romantic, and is too far from us to pulsate vigorously with living issues. Industrious, ingenious, curiously erudite, he comes about half-way between Daniel Defoe's time and ours, and rises decidedly toward the stature of that journalistic pioneer, bating always the fictive power which seems wholly wanting in him. He plunged into the whirlpool of London life just when the storm of the French Revolution had spent its first violence, and when the permanent currents of popular endeavour were making themselves felt in this country. It is difficult to realise that only a hundred years ago conditions were so different. If for no other reason, such a story as that of William Hone is worth telling to the present generation in order that the heirs of valiant champions of freedom in politics and religion, of reasonable clemency in law, and of higher social standards throughout the state, from the palace to the cottage, may spare themselves the shame of ignorantly looking down upon their heroic ancestors, and of enjoying without gratitude the invaluable boons which, at the price of much effort and suffering, those ancestors attained for them. Among such reformers were the knights of the press, regular and irregular.

Hone's part was chiefly with the latter branch of the service. For considerable periods, varied by more or less hopeless experiments at getting a living in other ways, he was a deviser, publisher, and vendor of ephemeral literature, ranging from monthly issues of information, useful or quaint, in magazine form, down to the mere fly-sheet and political squib. His more considerable productions were pamphlets and, by-and-by, such collections of out-of-the-way matter as still meet a demand in his "Every Day Book," "Table Book," and "Year Book"—good solid volumes to which Charles Lamb contributed some notable original writings and a series of dramatic extracts. Lamb was but one of many celebrated men with whom Hone had to do, and it will long be the latter's passport with many that to Elia the Ludgate-hill shopman was "Friend Hone." A whimsical letter sent to Hone after his conversion, and written in a Quakerish manner, is one of many testimonies to the liking that Lamb had for the man, a liking not to be dulled (we see) by a turn of mind hardly congenial to the heretical essayist.

Of course, the outstanding event in Hone's life was the prosecution by the Government, in 1817, for blasphemy. Hone, who had been brought up seriously, but had come, as most adventurous young men would at that time, into contact with the "New Philosophy," promulgated by Godwin, a contact which he grieved to acknowledge in later years, was in his teens a clerk with a solicitor named Pelletti, and so began an acquaintance with Unitarians which stood him in good stead in the crisis of his fate. Apparently the Unitarian influence restrained him from whatever excesses might have tempted a youthful "New Philosopher"; he says of himself later that he became a kind of "rational Christian," and this seems to have been his case till that change occurred, when he was over fifty, which gave joy in evangelical circles. Here, as may be only too easily understood, his rationalism had long been identified with "atheism"; but it does not appear that Hone ever adopted the atheistic position.

What he did, and it was in full accord with a good deal that was active in Unitarian circles in those years, was to attack the established orthodoxy on that very vulnerable side—the literature of the early Church. Probably a considerable number of modern readers know his name only in connection with a volume, still reprinted, entitled, "The Apocryphal New Testament," in which he gathered up the fruits of his study at the British Museum, and printed the translations there to be discovered of the Gospels of the Infancy and the uncanonical Epistles. He regretted this publication at a later time; but, except upon the point of scholarship, there can be little offence in it to students at this date, though doubtless there was in the narrower world of thought a hundred years ago.

Had Hone's rationalising moods taken no worse form he could hardly have been placed on trial for blasphemy. But his best friends must admit that in adapting the Creed, the Litany, and the Church Catechism to political polemics, he committed that sin which vexes some people more than a breach of decalogue—he was guilty of very bad taste indeed. The scurvy character of some of the politicians whom he dared to attack, the regular journals being mostly muzzled, may be pleaded in his excuse; the intense cleverness of his parodies only added to the offence. Made to stand his trial on three separate days for these delinquencies, he was so obviously the butt of outrageous wrath in high places that popular feeling overlooked whatever was reprehensible in his conduct, and, despite the strenuous and most unfair pressure of his judge, Lord Ellenborough himself, he was acquitted every time. The most stirring chapter in his biography tells the tale again, and it is well worth telling, how he stood there, the pale, solitary, sick, but resolute man, defending the rights of the press to the uttermost. Browbeaten and bullied he might be, but behind the particulars of his case there was a good principle at stake, and he so secured its victory against all odds, that from that date Governments have thought many times before they have ventured to stifle public comment, even in its most truculent form. As to the legitimate use of parody itself, painstaking hours of study at the Museum had furnished Hone with a vast store of instances, including those of writers and speakers of the most eminent position in the state; and what Hone himself had missed was supplied by one friendly hand and another, the most prominent of his helpers and advisers being Robert Aspland, the Unitarian leader.

Following his acquittal there was an outburst of sympathy for the man, and some £3,000 was subscribed for his benefit. But financial success was never any part of his horoscope. About one-third of this amount was spent by a lavish committee upon advertising the list and making appeals; another third was stolen by an absconding rascal. The remainder did not go far to pay for what had been lost in business and to set him up afresh. One failure after another makes up the monotonous melancholy of the tale, and after all his valiant struggles, and his brilliant audacities as a critic of the "First Gentleman in Europe," and his plodding work as a sort of universal instructor, we find him in advanced middle life weary, burdened with a large family, growing feeble in body and sick at heart. His "rational Christian" mind would seem to have been not too rational, for he had done nothing at all to help the inner life of his two elder children. For the sake of the younger four, he now began attending the Church of Allhallows, Lombard-street; but there the "simple, plain discourse of a well-intentioned clergyman" did not meet his case. So, "on New Year's Day, 1832," when he was in his fifty-second year, he went on from Lombard-street, after seeing the children safe in, and by chance dropped in at the Weigh House Chapel, Eastcheap.

The celebrated Thomas Binney was the preacher, and Hone that day felt the power of his appeal. He accepted the gospel as there preached, and after a decorous interval he and his household were added to the church-roll. The psychologist may ponder the subject, especially if he be a very "rational" Christian.

The malign influence that haunted his life played pranks even at his funeral. Charles Dickens and Cruikshank attended, and the novelist, then in the plenitude of youthful power, let his imagination run away with him most flagrantly when he wrote a description, smart, but untrue, of the scene. And Cruikshank, too, put forth rival claims in respect of some of Hone's more successful publications—but that was unfortunately in Cruikshank's later manner. The record provokes once more the question, "What is testimony?" Well, at least, the bibliographer may thank Mr. Hackwood for a very full and careful list of the strangely various publications of this strangely fated man.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

If religion were only nobly and truly conceived, it is difficult to believe that anyone would consider that God was honoured by prosecuting a fellow-man for what is legally called blasphemy. That religion is still basely and foolishly conceived is evident from the somewhat startling statement made in a leaflet issued by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws that there have been more prosecutions for blasphemy during the past year than during the previous fifty years; and that there have been more prosecutions for spoken blasphemy during the past five years than during the previous hundred years. The dictionaries tell us that blasphemy is "an indignity offered to God," it is "that which derogates from the prerogatives of God." These definitions represent a type of theology that one had fain hoped had now passed out of the minds of thoughtful men and women. The simple meaning of the word blasphemy is "hurt-speaking"; and the person "hurt" is not, as one would naturally suppose, the speaker or even the listener, but the Creator of the universe, the God and Father of mankind. If it is permissible in all reverence to speak of "hurting" God, then He must indeed be hurt by those who entertain such mean and ignoble conceptions of His being and character.

The denial of an article of religious faith, according to the canon law, injured the reputation of the Deity, and was severely punished at Rome and elsewhere; so also were the simpler forms of blasphemy which consisted in uttering unbecoming statements about God, Christ, the Sacraments, the Virgin, and the Saints. In the leaflet already referred to, it is pointed out that in England during the first five centuries in the history of Christianity, legal prohibitions of heresy were few and unimportant. Excommunication was a sufficiently terrible weapon in the hands of the priesthood to keep the exercise of private judgment within narrow bounds. When the authority of the Pope was less widely revered, and excommunication began to lose its terrors, then it seemed necessary to impose various legal enactments to suppress heresy. Statute and common law were called into requisition for the punishment of "offences against religion."

The laws still in force, and which it is desired to repeal, are as follows:—

(1) Depraving, despising, or reviling the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. (1 Ed. VI., c. 1.)

(2) To speak in derogation, depraving or despising of the Book of Common Prayer. (1 Eliz., c. 2, s. 3.)

(3) An Act for the more effectual suppression of blasphemy and profaneness. (9 Wm. III., c. 35.)

(4) An Act to prevent certain abuses and profanations on the Lord's Day. (21 Geo. III., c. 49.)

(5) An Act for the punishment of blasphemy in Scotland. (6 Geo. IV., c. 47.)

In addition to these older statutes there are sections that require repealing in the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839; the Town Police Act, 1847; the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888; and possibly words here and there in other Acts of Parliament.

The simplest and most satisfactory method of dealing with the whole question would be for Parliament to pass a Bill enacting that Blasphemy or Blasphemous Libel did not constitute an offence punishable under the common law or under any statute. Is it too much to expect that a large majority of Conservatives and Liberals might agree to the passing of such a Bill? That prosecutions for blasphemy are in direct opposition to the principles of civil and religious liberty, and contrary to the truest thought and best feeling of the twentieth century will be admitted, I hope, by most readers of THE INQUIRER.

If speakers at the street-corners, or in other public places, indulge in coarse and rowdy language, and thereby create a disturbance, let them be dealt with for a breach of the peace and punished accordingly, without reference to such foolish and outgrown conceptions as are involved in "injuring the reputation of the Deity," or "derogating from the prerogatives of God." There is too much justification for the statement that the present administration of the Law of Blasphemy allows the educated, scholarly blasphemer to escape legal censure or punishment, while the uneducated but equally sincere working man is caught in the meshes of the law, when in reality the scholar has perhaps dealt a far more deadly blow to orthodox belief than the orator at the street-corner.

I cannot do better than commend to the readers of THE INQUIRER two of the concluding paragraphs of the admirable leaflet issued by the Committee for the Repeal of the Blasphemy Laws.

"It is argued that these laws are obsolete. If they are obsolete, then nothing could be more simple or more straightforward than to abolish them. The proof that they are not obsolete is, first, that they are enforced; second, that their abolition is resisted. So long as there are people who oppose the abolition of the blasphemy laws, so long may we be quite sure that there are people who desire to see them enforced. The only way to ensure that no one shall be imprisoned or otherwise punished for his opinions is to take away the power to punish. Public opinion ought to be the one and only censor of the 'decencies of controversy.'"

"Freedom to criticise, freedom to express opinion, is one of the most valuable rights a man can possess, and should belong to the uncultured quite as much as to the cultured. We, therefore, plead for the entire abolition of the power to prosecute for the expression of opinion in matters of religion."

It is saddening—and may we not say humiliating to the Churches, Established and Free—to observe that the only people who have so far come forward publicly to assist in securing the repeal of the absurd Blasphemy Laws are classed as Ethical Culturists, Positivists, Secularists, and Unitarians.

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

SIR,—I hardly know whether your reviewer or myself is involved in the statements Miss Smith makes in this week's correspondence, but her letter is so full of what appear to me to be very dangerous fallacies, that I should be glad of a little of your kindness in granting me space in order to reply to them.

The first statement is that no man can fully know and diagnose the nature of woman. If this assertion were to read, no man can fully experience a woman's nature and outlook, it would, of course, be a perfectly obvious statement of fact; but to know is not necessarily to experience, if it were, science would have no existence, for its fundamental belief is that it transcends the individual's experience by a study of what is more general, and therefore it comes to possess a knowledge of what is wider than the personal, and therefore can frame laws. To imply that a man must always fail, as compared with a woman, to understand the nature of woman rests on the very dangerous fallacy that what is personal experience is science. As a fact Mulcaster, a man, preceded Mary Astell, a woman; and men of the eighteenth century the women of the nineteenth in writing about women, and Schopenhauer and Roscoe later women writers, and women writers have not contributed thoughts about the psychology of women that men had not previously stated. Miss Smith's second and third points are not in agreement. Womanhood is a collective noun implying the collective qualities of women as a class; if, therefore, a woman only knows herself and not any other woman's self, then no woman, according to Miss Smith, can understand what womanhood is, so that either her second or her third statement must be, by her own showing, illogical and unscientific. Her fourth point "that women have never had free development, and therefore, have not revealed their natures, so that they can be fairly studied, is one I have considered in my work, and shown that it has very little historical evidence to support it and a great deal against it. The most competent authorities, like those of Westermarck and Wright prove this contention to be untrue. Woman, half of the human race, has never been suppressed to this extent, and had she been so at any period her misery would have reacted upon the man, and rendered its continuance impossible. The really dissatisfied woman in all ages has found effective expression for her dissatisfaction, as we know from Egyptian, Greek, and Hebrew history, as well as from modern studies of primitive peoples. It is neither complimentary to woman nor true to fact to assume that she could be so abjectly subordinated. Lastly, Miss Smith insists that women should have the freedom to find themselves, but actual freedom is impossible for either sex. Locke long ago established the fact that no man or woman could be free who lived otherwise than alone, quite apart from society, and even then he or she would be bound by the laws of nature, and modified by the relationships of other non-human forms of life. And if to be free means to disregard what is already known as regards the life of woman so that the present age is not to have the advantage of the knowledge of the past, this would result in each generation repeating previous generations' blunders.

Men and women can both contribute to the study of men and women, men in their ways, women in their own; science and truth are open to all sincere inquirers after them, and to claim that woman should only think and act for woman, and man for man would lead to a dangerous, cold, and negative relationship without love and sympathy. I have no other wish than this, that men and women should study these questions together, not apart, and that the vastness of the issues involved should be recognised, and I hope Miss Smith will pardon the necessary shortness, but not any intentional curtness, of my reply.

May I also, in passing, thank your kindly reviewer, and express my agreement that it is light on this subject that is required.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE STORY OF CHRISTMAS.

Christmas in Ritual and Tradition, Christian and Pagan. By Clement A. Miles. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

MR. MILES has written a book of unusual interest and fascination, and he has maintained an admirable balance between the popular illustrated book of the libraries and a study of popular ritual and tradition based upon original authorities. How widely he has read anyone can discover who will turn to the admirable notes and bibliography at the end of the volume, and we do not resent the occasional impatience of the scholar who feels himself cramped for room and desires to be more thorough. He may, however, silence his misgivings with the thought that he has gathered together in a most readable form material which is scattered over a whole library of books, and that his delightful pages are likely to prompt many readers to further exploration for themselves.

The English calendar of festivals was sadly curtailed at the Reformation, and the massing of people in towns has tended to obliterate many of the quaint immemorial customs of those that remain. At Christmas, more than at any other period of the year, we touch hands with our past and forge anew the links which bind us alike to the childhood of our religion and the childhood of the race. There is no other day of high festival left to us which bears so clearly the traces of a strange and imperfect union between two independent streams of tradition, on the one hand the glad homage offered at the advent of the Saviour King, on the other the rites associated with the winter solstice and the propitiation of the spirit of fertility. The decoration of our homes and our churches, the singing of carols, the lights on the Christmas tree, the feasting and the giving of presents, the symbolic rites associated with the boar's head and the Yule log, had little to do in their origin with the manger of Bethlehem; but now nothing can tear them apart. This friendly accommodation, leading to gradual absorption, was not effected without a long and vehement struggle. It is a case in which popular tradition triumphed at the expense of the new religion. On this subject Mr. Miles writes as follows:—

"The struggle between the ascetic principle of self-mortification, world-renunciation, absorption in a transcendental ideal, and the natural human striving towards earthly joy and well-being, is, perhaps, the most interesting aspect of the history of Christianity; it is certainly shown in an absorbingly interesting way in the development of the Christian feast of the Nativity. . . . The Church's Christmas, as the Middle Ages pass on, becomes increasingly 'merry'—warm and homely, suited to the instincts of ordinary humanity, filled with a joy that is of this earth, and not only a mystical rapture at a transcendental Redemption."

It is this union of two principles which has suggested the excellent arrangement of Mr. Miles' material. In Part I. he deals with the Christian Feast, and gives us chapters on Christmas Poetry, Christmas in Liturgy and Popular Devotion, and Christmas Drama. It is pointed out that the beautiful symbolism of the presepio, though undoubtedly it owed its widespread popularity to the devotion of St. Francis, goes back to a much earlier time. We hear of it in the eighth century at the church of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, and it has been conjectured that it may have been associated with the church from its foundation by Pope Liberius in the fourth century. Part II. discusses the Pagan Survivals, and is an admirable essay on primitive religion and folklore in their relation to winter festivals. Here Mr. Miles has been wise to include the whole period from All Hallows to Epiphany and Candlemas. Christmas has absorbed into itself many of the rites connected with the dying year and its new birth, and local customs vary very widely. We may note in passing the interesting surmise that the contraction of these winter celebrations into a narrower space was due to an improvement in the methods of agriculture, which delayed the necessity for slaughtering the cattle owing to scarcity of food, and the sacrificial feasting associated with this event. The extent to which even the more riotous side of traditional merrymaking won the sanction of the Church is illustrated in the admirable chapter on the Mummers' Play, the Feast of Fools, and the Boy Bishop. Even in the nineteenth century Christmas had not lost all its power of absorption. "The Christmas card," Mr. Miles tells us, "a sort of attenuated present, seems to be of quite modern origin. . . . The first Christmas card proper appears to have been issued in 1846, but it was not till about 1862 that the custom of card-sending obtained any foothold."

In commending Mr. Miles' book to our readers as a most tempting and desirable Christmas present, we must not forget its illustrations. In addition to four coloured plates produced by the Medici Society, there are sixteen half-tone plates, many of them chosen from unfamiliar sources, including a quaint Jacopone in ecstasy from the edition of the "Laude" published in Florence in 1490.

SOME CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

CHRISTMAS comes with its ever-increasing flow of old and new, of cheap and costly books from the purveyors of literary wares.

Messrs. Constable, realising the boom in Dickens, have met the needs of the rising generation by issuing two of the stories originally published in America under the title of "Holiday Romance," THE TRIAL OF WILLIAM TINKLING and CAPTAIN BOLD-HEART AND THE LATIN GRAMMAR MASTER (each 1s. net). They are illustrated with great skill by Beatrice Pearce, the coloured pictures being specially pleasing and funny. The name of the publishers is a sufficient guarantee of good work in printing and binding. Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Wonder Book" is a perennial source of joy to imaginative children, and the same publishers offer us four of his stories, THE PARADISE OF CHILDREN, THE GOLDEN TOUCH, THE GORGON'S HEAD, THE THREE GOLDEN APPLES (1s. net each), with pictures of real beauty by Patten Wilson which make the old Greek legends they illustrate doubly fascinating.

Dr. Greville Macdonald follows worthily in his father's steps. He has written a story, TRYSTIE'S QUEST; OR, KIT, KING OF THE PIGWIDGEOONS (A. C. Fifield, 5s. net), that will take its place among the classics of fairy lore. The pictures by Arthur Hughes are in complete harmony with the text, dainty and delicate black and white drawings. The author's dedication to a little four-year-old patient is beautiful in its poetic simplicity and sheds light on the secret of his appeal to young minds. THE BROOM FAIRIES (A. C. Fifield, 1s. 6d. net) and other short stories in a neat little volume, by Miss Ethel M. Gate, comes from the same publisher. But tales of this kind, however well written, cannot nowadays attain popularity unless they are illustrated. It is a picture palace age.

A really fresh and original book, a sort of modern "Pilgrim's Progress," called THE GOOD SHIP "SAFETY" (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net), has been written by the Rev. James Black, of Edinburgh. It is an allegory of the Church and of the Soul of Man on its journey through this world from eternity to eternity. It is very cleverly done in simple and telling language, and would be an excellent book to read to Sunday school children, for a story always appeals, and the application is so clear that girls and boys of average brightness would easily grasp the truths it is intended to convey.

THE FIELD-FLOWERS' LORE, by Louise M. Glazier (Elkin Mathews, 2s. 6d. net), would be a delightful gift-book for a girl of poetic and artistic tastes. It is a collection of flower legends re-written in verse and illustrated in charming, quaint woodcuts by the authoress.

THE PREACHER, HIS LIFE AND WORK. By J. H. Jowett, D.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.

THE Yale lectureship in Preaching has produced many helpful volumes, which serve a high and honourable purpose if they stimulate one generation of preachers and clarify their ideals without being destined for immortality. Dr. Jowett speaks with the compelling power of a preacher who has reached the zenith of success without the use of meretricious arts. In an age where pitfalls beset the preacher on every side, and the enemy lies in wait to destroy the simplicity and self-forgetfulness of his work, he pleads for many of the old methods and ideals and renews the promise of joy to those who will trust themselves entirely to the direct appeal of soul to soul. Many ministers will read some of his pages with a feeling of self-abasement as they acknowledge the need of his plain words of warning and recognise something more alarming than possible dangers in the faults which he describes. Much fine talent is being wasted at the present time through crude imitation of greater men or the vanity which feeds itself on shallow press notices or the self-advertisement which sits so strangely on a professed servant of Christ. "Self-advertisement," Dr. Jowett writes, "is deadly in the ministry of the Lord Jesus. Puffy, showy paragraphs concerning ourselves and our work; egotistical recitals of our powers and attainments; all forms of self-obtrusion and self-aggression—all these are absolutely fatal to the really deepest work committed to our hands." More subtle, but equally perilous, are the snares of heated argument and the controversial temper, which are often mistaken for signs of religious zeal in spite of the warning that the servant of the Lord must not strive. "Every preacher knows how sensitive is the organ of spiritual perception, and how vigilantly it has to be guarded if he is to retain his vision and apprehension of the 'deeper things' of God. You will find that jealousy can scale your eyes until the heavens give no light." These words have nothing novel in them. They are as applicable to the first century as to the twentieth. But the warning can never lose its force for men who are called to preach an eternal gospel amid the things of time and to keep their hearts free from dust and stain as a mirror of the Divine perfection.

GOLDEN GRAIN: THOUGHTS OF MANY MINDS. Compiled by Lady Agatha Russell. London: James Nisbet & Co. 2s. net.

A FEW words of grateful commendation are all that we need interpose between Lady Agatha Russell's sheaf of golden grain and the numerous quiet and thoughtful gleaners who will turn to it for their own profit. Many people, we hope, still keep note-books to which they commit memorable passages in their reading, but few are able to produce from their store such a rich harvest of aphorisms and pregnant sayings as are garnered for us here. The book can be used as a daily companion for the quiet moments of recollection, and it is arranged conveniently in days and months for this purpose, or it can be carried about in the pocket in order to keep the mind in the empyrean while the body is hurried by devious ways underground. We have discovered already what an excellent anodyne it is to the vexations of the London Tubes. Mr. Frederic Harrison has written a short preface in the pleasant style compact of literary reminiscence which we know so well. "Big book, big nuisance," said the Greeks in their pithy way," he writes. "Now this is a very small and portable book, and it may be read casually, with passages of a few lines each, at intervals if you wish. . . . The weak spot of many so-called Birthday Books is sentimentalism, rather morbid self-pity and querulous shrinking from fact, from duty, from life in all its stern realities. I do not find that here; I do find a solemn sense of the tragedies of humanity, and a hold on religious hopes and consolations." The compiler could hardly desire more judicious praise, and we have only to add that we endorse it heartily.

A CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL COMMENTARY ON THE EPISTLES OF ST. PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS. By James Everett Frame. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 10s. 6d.

THE International Critical Commentary makes slow progress towards completion. Designed as it is for the careful student of the original Hebrew and Greek, and founded upon the traditions of minute textual exegesis which we have inherited from a past generation, it affords little scope for literary appreciation and less severely scholastic methods of study. There is indeed a possibility just looming above the horizon, that its point of view may become a little antiquated before it stands completed on our shelves. Most of our commentaries, even of the liberal school, are still deeply tinged with the discredited doctrine of verbal inspiration. Too few of them treat the New Testament with the insight of imagination and sympathy, which is the only key to the treasures of creative literature, where words are not counters in an intellectual game but the vital and iridescent language of the soul. Professor Frame, of the Union Theological Seminary, New York, has followed the approved model in his volume on the two Thessalonian Epistles. It is furnished with a full apparatus of scholarship, and the usual long list of abbreviations, which give such a crabbed appearance to the pages which follow. In a word, it is a rocky book, in which the student must dig in the sweat of his brow; but in the midst of his labour he may find himself suddenly baffled by the question, whether St. Paul with his big human heart and torrential passion really belongs to the race of verbal scholastics who inhabit the temperate regions of criticism.

MESSRS J. M. DENT & SONS will publish in January the first volume of "The Everyman Encyclopedia," which will be edited by Mr. Andrew Boyle. The full set will consist of twelve volumes, and it is the intention to issue one volume per month, so that the last volume will be ready in December, 1913. This Encyclopedia will be quite a new production, and will form an integral part of "Everyman's Library." It will be a practical, comprehensive, and yet condensed work of reference for students and readers of all branches of literature and history. Each volume, we are informed, will consist of 640 pages, embracing 500,000 words, whilst the complete set will contain not only 6,000,000 words, but it will also supply more articles than any similar work.

MISS A. M. ODGERS has once more contributed the picture on the Motto Card of the Sunday School Association for the year 1913. It represents a happy family group returning home from the cornfield in the hot sunshine of an August day laden with golden sheaves, and illustrates the well-known verse from the Psalms, "He shall come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him." On the back of the card are the Bible readings for the year.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

PRIZES.

I SUPPOSE as Christmas draws near many children will be thinking about their prizes, and of the pride they will have in taking them home. We all like to see our work rewarded. I remember that I was quite proud of a farthing which I got for reading when I was quite little, and even an acid drop for answering some question correctly made me quite pleased. But it is sometimes hard to do the work in order to get our prize. How bravely we start on the term's work, how carefully we write our exercises and go through our problems to begin with, how soon we tire and are tempted to get slack. When I went to school I sometimes had a sum to do of which I knew the answer for I had done it before, but I wasn't always able to show how it was arrived at, so I put down the figures before the answer as best I could. The exercise would come back, and written across it these words: "Show the working!" That is the hard thing, and many people try to get out of the working. We very often call those people by a very ugly name; we call them hypocrites, for they want people to think them very good when they are not really working to be good at all.

I am sure all of us want to do real work for the prizes we get, and perhaps some of us don't do as much as we ought. Perhaps your mother ought really to get the prize, as my mother used to say she thought she ought. Maybe you would often have been late if she hadn't helped you, and would often have failed in your lessons had she not shown you the way. Well, there is nothing to be ashamed of in seeking help where we really need it, but we should do as much as we can for ourselves, for by that our characters are made strong.

It isn't always the boy or girl who gets the first prize who works the hardest. It may be that they can master the subject much better than the one who comes second, and it may not have cost them half the effort that it cost someone who came much lower on the list. In the school you attend only those who are top get the prizes, but in the world even the things we fail to win help to make us what we are. We may not get prizes of books or money, but our characters are made stronger because of the attempt, we become great perseverers, glorious triers, and such people the world greatly needs. A London minister once told a story of a little girl who never went to church or Sunday school, but who worked very hard for her brothers and sisters, because her mother was dead. One day she was taken ill, and her friend who went to Sunday school came to see her and told her of Jesus. When she heard of His life on earth she said: "And what will He say to me who have never heard anything of Him or had any chance of knowing what He wanted me to do?" and her friend said simply, "Show Him your hands." That was a fine answer to make, wasn't it? She had not known much, but what little she had known she had tried to do to the utmost of her powers, and of course the reward would be her's just the same.

It doesn't matter so much what the prize is as what it means. I once went in for a very easy competition. I simply had to name what I thought was the best animal for a girl. I said a cat, and of course I won, as also did a good many others. But I wasn't very proud; there was nothing very clever in that. I wasn't nearly so pleased as when I won a prize for Scripture and another for reporting a lecture. Now we often think much more about the value of the prize in money than of anything else. We like to know that a book cost a good many shillings; when we get older we shall think more of what these gifts mean, of the work they represent, of the kindness they express. Possibly a letter may come to mean quite as much as a book, though you may not now think much of anything like that. We may not always get the prize we want. Perhaps in your school you are not allowed to choose as boys and girls in some schools are permitted to, and you hope to have a certain book and are disappointed to find the one you are awarded much drier than the one you coveted. Never mind that; you must remember that you are only a child for a short period of your life, and you may be glad afterwards that you were given a volume that will be of use to you far, far longer than any book of stories could have been. I bought once on a second-hand bookstall a little book which had a label inside, showing that it was presented to a boy as a prize in a War Leaders' Competition. What do you think it was?—It was the great Bishop Butler's Sermons on Human Nature. I expect that boy was disappointed, don't you?—perhaps even disgusted, but probably if he was wise he thought that after all it meant that he had been successful, and that was something.

When I went to manual training the reward we got for our good work was that we were allowed to take home what we had made. We shall, if we do true work, be making our own reward day by day. I once heard a story of a rich man who got to heaven, and when he was shown the mansion prepared for him he said, "Why, what a small place; do you know that I have been used to a fine house on earth—pray whose is that fine palace over there?" "Oh," said the angel, "that is your gardener's." "My gardener's," replied the rich man, "Why, how's that?" "Well, you see," said the angel, "he was always sending us up materials to build with, but you sent us so little that we could not possibly manage anything better than this little house." All of you can understand that. We are making our own prizes by putting our best into every day, and we never know when we are thus trying how fine the reward may be, and how soon it may come. Matthew Arnold has some lines about this, which I think, if you read them carefully, you will understand.

With aching hands and bleeding feet
We dig and heap, lay stone on stone;
We bear the burden and the heat
Of the long day, and wish 'twere done.
Not till the hours of light return
All we have built do we discern.

The Apostle Paul spoke of the prize of the "high calling." That means that the reward of good work is really to be asked to do something better. You know that a man does not have a prize-day at his shop or office. Nobody says, "Now you have been very regular, punctual and diligent, and I will give you a book!" No; his reward is to obtain a higher position, and to be given charge of more important work. A man once said to an old general, "What will you get by this victory?" "I shall have the honour to fight foremost in the ranks of my prince," was the reply. That is, too, our highest reward, to get stronger in doing good, to be promoted to finer work; that is the reward of which Tennyson speaks when he says:—

Glory of virtue, to fight to struggle, to right the wrong—
Nay, but she aimed not at glory, no lover of glory she;
Give her the glory of going on, and still to be.

CARMARTHEN PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE.

LECTURES ON THE CULTURE AND RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT.

A NEW departure of great interest and value in the work of Carmarthen Presbyterian College has been made possible through the kind thoughtfulness and generosity of Mr. J. Bancroft Willans, of Dolforgan. To him the College is indebted for provision of a short course of three lectures on "The Culture and Religion of Ancient Egypt," delivered on November 27, 28, and 29, by Miss M. A. Murray, Lecturer to the Oxford University Extension Delegacy and Curator of the Edwards Egyptological Library and the Flinders Petrie Museum, at University College, London. Designed to supplement the College classes in Comparative Religion, the lectures admirably fulfilled their object, and had the added attraction of copious lantern illustrations. With the easy mastery born of perfect command of all the intricacies of her subject, the lecturer sketched in clear outline in the first lecture the chronology of Egyptian history, and indicated the modern methods of calculating the length of the historic period, and fixing the dates of the principal dynasties. She then gave an able description of the outstanding features of Egyptian art in its chief phases and periods, and displayed the close dependence of its stylistic features upon the landscape of the country. The surprising fact that its finest masterpieces, probably never surpassed, belong to a date 4,000 years B.C. was suitably accentuated. The lecture concluded with a clear account of the decipherment of the language, and of its leading features, followed by a sketch of the chief department of Egyptian literary activity.

The second and third lectures were entirely devoted to the ancient Egyptian religion. Selecting her material with much skill, and concentrating on the most important aspects of her subject, Miss Murray gave a most interesting preliminary outline of the Egyptian beliefs in Immortality and the Hereafter. Incidentally, she showed the extreme antiquity of such beliefs, as proved by the contents of the prehistoric graves, dating from not less than 5,000 years B.C. The high ethical value of the doctrine of the future judgment before Osiris, and of the striking negative confession of freedom from the forty-two chief sins was illustrated, and the doctrine of the Ka or Double of the individual was adequately and clearly explained according to the prevailing authoritative exposition. The great importance which this doctrine derives from the fact that to belief in it we owe nearly all the knowledge we possess about ancient Egypt was fittingly emphasised. In the complex elements which go to make up the Egyptian Pantheon, the Solar Gods, the Local Deities, and the Osirian group were distinguished, and dealt with seriatim. The treatment of the Solar Gods gave opportunity to portray the thorough-going monotheistic reform of Akhenaten at Tell el Amarna, about 1,400 B.C., by which, while bloody sacrifices were entirely done away with, Aten was declared to be the Almighty Sole Creator of the universe, the one alone, beside whom no other God existed. After indicating the place of the Local Gods in the chain of historical development, the lecturer dealt in the third lecture on the Significance of Osiris and the Osiris-Cult in Egypt and in the general history of religion, in a treatment which displayed the high rank belonging to it in the history of the aspirations of the human mind.

The lectures were thoroughly enjoyed and highly appreciated not only by all the members of the College, but by the ministers and clergy and leading residents of the town, who had accepted invitations to attend. And when the gratitude of the College authorities was at the close warmly expressed to Mr. Willans, who was present, and had presided at the opening lecture, it was hoped that the example he had set with such gratifying results might be followed up in the future with great profit in other fields of religious history.

THE INCREASE OF FLOGGING.

THE following memorial has been addressed to the Prime Minister by the Humanitarian League :—

To the Rt. Hon. H. H. ASQUITH, K.C., M.P.,
First Lord of the Treasury.

SIR,—We desire most respectfully to express to you our deep regret that, by pressing the flogging clauses of the Criminal Law Amendment (White Slave Traffic) Bill on the acceptance of the House of Commons, the Government have given renewed sanction to a vindictive practice which, after full trial in the past, had been to a great extent discarded, and which was described by yourself in a previous Parliamentary discussion as “a retrogression to an obsolete theory of punishment.”

We note that the Home Secretary, while in this case justifying the use of flogging as a quite exceptional penalty for the most callous of crimes, denied that there was any danger of its more general adoption; but, unfortunately, there are many signs that the door once thrown open will not be so easily closed. Already, in the Courts, recommendations have been made for the legalising of the lash for a number of offences which cannot possibly be placed in the category to which Mr. McKenna referred; and there has been aroused in many quarters a spirit of vengeful resentment against criminals of all classes which it may be difficult to curb. We would in particular refer to the marked increase during the past few months in the flogging sentences passed under the Vagrancy Act, an ancient statute by which most severe punishments may be inflicted upon so-called “incorrigible rogues” who have not even been brought before a jury.

We submit that, by the Home Secretary's own argument, if it be necessary to resort to flogging for the most brutal forms of crime, it must equally be desirable to withdraw the power to flog where no such necessity can be alleged, and we fear that the Government's action in the one case, and inaction in the other, will be interpreted as an encouragement to judges and magistrates to use the lash more freely, and to all advocates of flogging to redouble their reactionary demands.

Among the signatories are the following :—Lord Courtney of Penwith, Earl Russell, Sir W. P. Byles, M.P., J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., H. G. Chancellor, M.P., H. Manfield, M.P., John Ward, M.P., Will Thorne, M.P., W. Llewellyn Williams, M.P., Recorder of Swansea; J. C. Wedgwood, M.P.; J. Keir Hardie, M.P., Dr. Alfred R. Wallace, O.M., the Rt. Hon. Sir John E. Gorst, Sir James Crichton-Browne, Sir W. J. Collins, the Lord Provost of Glasgow, Canon A. L. Lilley, General Bramwell Booth, the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Mr. Israel Zangwill, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. H. G. Wells, Professor Gilbert Murray, Mr. Edward Carpenter, Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr. Thomas Holmes, Lady Byles, Lady Barlow, Lady Emily Lutjens, Dr. John Clifford, the Rev. W. Douglas Morrison, Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. Graham Wallas, Mr. Walter Crane, Sir Henry Cotton, Mr. C. P. Scott, Mr. R. B. Cunningham-Graham, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Professor Patrick Geddes, Miss May Morris, Miss Gertrude Toynbee, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

BOYS' OWN BRIGADE.

LONDON BATTALION.

THE constituent companies of the Battalion have now been steadily at work on their autumn and winter programme of drill, gymnastics, Sunday school, church parades, &c., for some eight to ten weeks, and substantial progress is noticeable. There are now six companies associated in the London group, the latest addition to the roll being a very promising company at Bell-street Mission. At Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, the Rev. B. Lister is encouraging a group of boys to hope for the inauguration of a new company there also, and to stimulate local interest the 1st Company (Stamford-street Chapel) paid a visit to Hackney on November 18 and gave a display of marching, physical, ambulance, and Swedish drill, at the close of which the Brigade President (Mr. R. P. Jones) showed a number of lantern slides illustrating life in a B.O.B. camp. The Battalion Executive would like to make it known that they are willing and glad to arrange for such demonstrations to be given at any of the churches in the London district, and they invite those interested to write to the Hon. Sec., 48, Ruskin-walk, Herne Hill, S.E.

On Thursday, December 5, the Annual Battalion Concert was held at Mansford-street Church, by invitation of the officers of the 3rd Company, which has made remarkable progress during the past few months, and has lately instituted a “brass band,” under the kindly tuition of the Rev. John Toye, of Limehouse. The concert, which was attended by about 120 boys and officers, and a considerable number of friends, included the united singing of favourite B.O.B. songs, musical items by various members and friends, lantern slides of the 1912 camp at Deal, shown by the President, and the presentation of prizes won at the camp.

The annual meeting of the London Battalion Council will be held at Stamford-street Chapel on Monday, December 16, at 8.45 p.m., and it may be announced here that all who are interested in the movement will be heartily welcomed.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH AT TORQUAY.

THE new Unitarian Church, which has been erected in Higher Terrace-road, Torquay, was dedicated for Divine Worship on December 10, the special preacher being the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, principal of Manchester College, Oxford. There was a crowded congregation, including many members of the Devon Unitarian Ministers' Association, and the Revs. J. C. Charteris Johnston (Congregational), W. Hookins (United Methodist), and J. E. Thorpe (Primitive Methodist). Prayers were offered and lessons read by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, minister-in-charge, and a solo was rendered by Mr. T. Lee Lloyd, accompanied on the organ by Mr. C. Heaviside, who also led in the rendering of the hymns.

At the conclusion of the service a large number adjourned to the Unity Hall, where a sale of work was held and tea provided.

A public meeting, held in the evening, was largely attended, Mr. C. Hawksley, president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, presiding. Among those present were the Rev. Dr. Carpenter, the Rev. C. and Mrs. Hargrove, the Rev. A. and Mrs. Lancaster, the Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Burgess, the Rev. F. and Mrs. Allen, the Rev. W. and Mrs. Agar, the Rev. C. E. and Mrs. Jewell, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., the Revs. A. E. Connor, J. Birks, J. Worthington, S. W. Wright, W. L. Tucker, E. R. Hodges, R. Davis, and E. Turland.

The Chairman paid a tribute to the efforts of Mr. Henry Lupton on behalf of the provision of the new church.

The Rev. Dr. Carpenter referred to the great progress of theological knowledge and unity amongst those who were once separated on the great religious questions. Old ignorances and prejudices were fast passing away, and there had recently been great changes, tending towards an agreement on matters the differences as to which were once regarded as fundamental. Many were now coming round to the view that the infallibility of the Bible was impossible. As Unitarians they believed it was possible for men with common principles, but different beliefs to work and worship together. Mr. Henry Lupton (secretary of the congregation) announced that £2,463 had been subscribed towards the £3,120 required, and that 90 per cent. of the money promised had been received.

Dr. Blake Odgers expressed the congratulations of representatives from the South-Western counties and other parts of the country to the congregation on having entered its new home. Votes of thanks were accorded the chairman, speakers, and others.

During the meeting the following resolution was carried :—

“That since it is our persuasion that the real salvation of men, here and hereafter, depends not upon what they believe nor upon what forms of worship they observe, but upon each being faithful to the highest and best in his own soul, we therefore do not set ourselves up to be either the opponents or rivals of other churches, but sincerely wish to them all, and especially to those in this town, that they may prosper in the work common to us—the forwarding the interests of the Kingdom of God on earth.”

The new church is situated on a lofty site in the Higher Terrace-road. The building has a floor space of 42 ft. by 28 ft., and is collar-ceiled at a height of 21 ft. Externally it is faced with local-dressed limestone. Internally, the roof principals are of steel, wood cased, and with the plate and purlins exposed to view. The pulpit and organ are recessed under pointed arches, and a minister's vestry is supplied with a separate entrance. The floors of the porches and vestibule are paved with Terrazzo marble mosaic, and the rest of the premises with wood blocks in parquetry patterns. The joinery is of clear pitchpine. The building is lighted with electricity, and motor power has been laid on for the organ. At the western extremity is placed a lecture hall, 28 ft. by 25 ft., with an elliptical ceiling, divided by plaster ribs, and convenient classrooms attached. The architects are Messrs. Bridgeman & Bridgeman.

THE MACEDONIAN RELIEF FUND.

The following appeal has been issued signed by the Bishop of London, Lord Haversham, Dr. John Clifford, and Mr. Bertram Christian on behalf of the Macedonian Relief Fund :—

Among the sufferers by the war in Eastern Europe there are none whose position is so helpless as that of the many thousands of townfolk and peasantry in Macedonia, Thrace and Albania, who have fled from their homes in complete destitution during the military operations, and are faced, at the beginning of the Balkan winter, with the menace of starvation, cold and disease.

It is upon these defenceless people, who are outside the scope of the Red Cross, that the Macedonian Relief Fund, which after the devastation of 1903 relieved over 53,700 persons with the approval and support of the Foreign Office, is primarily concentrating its efforts. It earnestly appeals for liberal support to make its measures again effective. Churches of all denominations are especially urged to make collections.

One of the honorary agents of the Committee, Mr. Louis Cahen, is at Uskub, in the centre of Macedonia, where he has arranged for the systematic distribution of relief in that town and in the province of Kossovo. Miss Edith Durham, who has acted for several years for the Committee, is initiating plans for the relief of non-combatants, Christian and Moslem, in Montenegro and Albania. Miss K. S. Macquene (who has had great experience as Nursing Superintendent for England in the Queen Victoria Jubilee Nurses' Institute) and Mr. Edward Giles are about to proceed to Salonica in response to an earnest appeal for help.

Further subscriptions are urgently needed. They may be earmarked for distribution among the refugees in any country, and may be sent to Messrs. Barclay & Co., Ltd., 1, Pall Mall East, S.W., the bankers of the Fund, or to the Acting Secretary, Mr. W. T. Cunningham, 39, Victoria-street, S.W., by whom gifts of clothing will also be gratefully accepted.

REPORTS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

The Committee of the Macedonian Relief Fund continue to receive urgent appeals for the relief of the distress from its agents in various centres in Macedonia.

USKUB AND KOSSOVO.—Mr. Louis Cahen, who has made Uskub his centre and is actively co-operating with the Servian authorities in that town, telegraphed on November 29 :—

“Municipality organising relief, but has quite inadequate funds. Promptness British relief greatly appreciated. Moslem crowds surround bread carts invoking God's blessing Britain. Several deaths already from hunger; when winter comes disease will be terrible. One house alone 140 refugees. Fear similar distress exists throughout European Turkey. Leaving for Prishtina and tour in Kossovo.”

Since starting on his tour of inspection he again telegraphed on December 3 from Mitrovitz :—

“Shall require money urgently on return; send £1,000 to Consul, Uskub.” In a letter Mr. Cahen writes describing his work :—

“I have arranged with the Mayor and with the Municipality for the organisation and distribution of food, and that we shall provide the food. He is most grateful for the help, and said I arrived at the moment when help was most needed. The Head Baker of the Bakers' Guild came and we ordered 1,000 loaves at 40 centimes each, for which I paid on the spot and got receipt. This afternoon we started off in procession: four carts of bread, a Serb soldier, the deputy Mayor, the Head Baker and son, myself, and the Consul. . . . In each district the ‘Mukhtar,’ or head man, came out with his list and the bread was given to the needy parties. To-morrow morning we go out again early.”

He adds, “The Mayor at once knew the name of the Macedonian Relief Fund and all about the good work done in 1903.”

MONTENEGRO AND ALBANIA.—The following is an extract from a recent letter from Miss Durham :—

“People in England hardly realise that that wretched strip of land between Scutari and the Montenegrin frontier has now been at war in truth ever since April, 1911. It is now being fought over for the second time, swept bare first by the Turkish army last year and this year by the Montenegrins. Last year, as you know, all Christian houses burnt, this year practically all Moslem ones. . . . I have been over the scenes of the recent fighting as far as within an hour's walk of Scutari, and am deeply pained at the awful desolation there.”

SALONICA AND MONASTIR.—From Salonica a correspondent of the Fund writes :—

“Salonica, already occupied by 25,000 Turkish refugees, is now filled up with Greeks and Bulgarians. Yesterday and to-day there is no bread for anybody. I am giving flour away for the poor people to arrange as best they can. I am writing to you to enlist once more your sympathies for the villages. What is to happen this winter to the peasants? The men, horses, bullocks, and carts have all been requisitioned; after that the poor people had to give their small store laid up for the winter. Everywhere it is the same story. The day will come when these people will try to drift back to their homes, and will find everything once more looted, and very often burnt. Christians and Turks will all be in the same position. There will be plenty of work all the winter in the villages—surgeons to operate neglected wounds, and nurses to look after the people, above all relief work to prevent the people starving. Even here in Salonica people will presently starve. The difficulty is to get bread.”

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

THE Rev. W. J. Clarke writes from the Domestic Mission, Hurst-street, Birmingham :—“For twenty-eight successive years I have had what I deem both the privilege and the duty of endeavouring to raise a fund to enable me not only to bring some measure of Christmas comfort and New Year brightness into large numbers of poor homes, but also, the whole year through, to alleviate the privations of many of the suffering and truly deserving poor, especially the aged and the young. In the distribution of this fund, scrupulous care is taken to discriminate between the poverty which is self-sought, and that of which the sufferers are simply the helpless and innocent victims. Will you, therefore, kindly allow me to say that should it be agreeable to any of your readers to entrust me with the distribution of any share of their Christmas bounty and New Year goodwill, I will do my utmost to make it productive of as large a measure as possible not only of temporary, but of permanent blessing in the homes and hearts where the helping hand and the cheering word are all too sadly needed. Unhappily, I have recently lost several of my oldest and largest contributors by death, so that a generous response to this present appeal would be more than usually welcome and encouraging."

THE Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, writes from 48, Ruskin-walk, Herne Hill, S.E. :- "Will you kindly allow me to join with my brother missionaries in appealing through your columns for those special contributions which are so helpful in many ways at this season of the year, and which form a fund upon which to draw for special purposes throughout the year? I hope that to those who have subscribed to this fund at Stamford-street in the past, there may be added some new donors, interested in the work of this chapel and mission."

CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED. THE INQUIRER FUND.

MISS DENDY, hon. secretary of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society for the Permanent Care of the Feeble-minded, acknowledges the following contributions to our fund :-

Mrs. Moor (Healthy Children Fund)	£1	1	0
"Healthy Children"	0	5	0

Miss Dendy writes :-

"I have now four thousand cases on my list, and of these not one thousand are being cared for in any way, and not five hundred in any efficient way. I am refusing cases nearly every day, and spend much time in answering piteous appeals for help from fathers and mothers who are in deep anxiety about their adolescent boys and girls. Nine times out of ten I can do nothing—nothing, that is, but listen and sympathise."

It is announced by the Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire that Professor Jacks will deliver the Provincial Assembly Lecture for 1913 in Manchester on Wednesday, March 12. Further particulars will be given nearer the time.

A special performance of "Eager Heart" will be given on Tuesday evening under the auspices of the Liberal-Christian League at the one uniform charge of 1s. to all parts of the house. Special terms for parties of over twenty. Applications must be made at once to Miss Alleyne, Hon. Secretary, L.C.L., at 28, Red Lion-square, W.C.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham.—The Rev. Ellison A. Voysey is deeply grateful for the great sympathy which has been shown him by his brother ministers and numerous other friends in his bereavement. He would gladly write a personal acknowledgment in all cases, but the number of messages which he has received makes this quite impossible.

Blackpool.—A "Neighbourhood Concert" was given in connection with the Unitarian Free Church, South Shore, on Monday, December 9. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith presided, and an excellent programme was rendered. A course of week evening "Neighbourhood Lectures" on literary and scientific subjects was announced.

Burnley.—A two days' Sale of Work has just been held in connection with the Unitarian Church in Trafalgar-street, with the object of providing funds for the carrying on of the work of the Church and Sunday school and reducing an adverse balance on the general fund. The Sale was opened by Mr. G. W. Pemberton, of Blackburn, Mr. David Harrison, of Padiham, presiding. The receipts for the first day were £61.

Clifton: The Late Miss Mabel Hincks.—We deeply regret to record the death of Miss Hincks, the daughter of the late Rev. Thomas Hincks, F.R.S., formerly minister at Warrington, and Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, which occurred suddenly on December 1, at Clifton. The funeral took place on December 5, when the body was cremated at Leeds, the service being conducted by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, formerly minister of Oakfield-road Church, Clifton. In the course of a touching and sympathetic address, based on close personal friendship, Mr. Fripp spoke of her as a Puritan after Mr. Ruskin's own heart, almost austere in righteousness, with an unerring instinct and passionate love for whatsoever things are fair and excellent, and with a breadth of view too wide for that old mediæval world of dreams and visions in which she delighted. It was natural to associate her with scenes and objects of beauty, and that world of beauty went with her into all her duties.

Hackney.—An urgent appeal is being made for £4,000 for the purpose of enlarging and improving the school building of the New Gravel Pit Church, one of the oldest Unitarian churches in London. In spite of the insufficiency and unsuitability of much of the accommodation, the school now numbers 230 scholars with an average attendance of 172 per Sunday, and meetings are held in connection with the classes and institutions nearly every night in the week. Every month, however, it is necessary to refuse applicants for admission, and obviously the present arrangements are only possible as a temporary expedient until adequate and suitable accommodation can be provided. The proposed improvements include new classrooms, better living-rooms for the caretaker and his family, and other conveniences, and a Church Hall for week-evening meetings, visible and easily accessible from the public road. The congregation has already contributed £415, but an appeal must now be made to a wider circle in the confident hope that the friends of Liberal Christianity, when they know the nature of the work and the urgency of the need at Hackney, will assist in providing the equipment necessary for the work of a well-staffed Sunday school with the various institutions and classes. Contributions will be gratefully received by Mr. J. S. Harding, 40, Darent-road, Stamford Hill, N.

Leeds.—In the course of his address, entitled "Salute the Saints," at the evening service at Mill-hill Chapel on Sunday, December 8, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston made an appropriate reference to the late Dr. Collyer. It was a pleasure, he said, to name his name in the building where he had preached so often, and where he had christened into the Church many, some of whom might be present that night. He referred to his humble start in life, the manner in which he made his way upwards, of the courage with which he made his change, the great life which opened out for him when he crossed the Atlantic, the thousands of lives into which, with his rugged eloquence, he had dropped seed which had brought forth one hundred fold, and of the love he had deserved and had gained. The cause of it all was his faith in God; he was a true example of modern sainthood.

Lewisham.—On Monday evening, December 9, Mr. Athelstone A. Tayler, Chairman of the London District Unitarian Society, gave a very interesting lecture to the members of the Literary and Scientific Society in connection with the Unitarian Church on "George Borrow." On Tuesday evening, a recital of Dickens' "Cricket on the Hearth" was given by Mrs. W. Randall Marshall, whose successful rendering of the well-known story was much appreciated. In connection with these events, the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope writes :- "Will someone organise the talent within our own borders for the benefit of the congregations? Some years ago a book containing names of members of the Laymen's Club, who were prepared to give lectures, &c., was placed in the reading-room at Essex Hall. It is not known how much good resulted from that, but it is quite certain that congregations are missing such help as recitals, lectures, &c., in London especially, because of the lack of a little organisation."

London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly.—The Managers of the Auxiliary Fund (London and South Eastern Counties), who, owing to the lamented death of Mr. John Harrison, its founder and treasurer, were unable to report to the Oxford meeting in October, have now presented their report to the Executive Committee of the Assembly. The following arrangements have been approved by that committee :- The Rev. H. Gow and Mr. Edgar Worthington to be appointed managers in the place of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards (resigned) and Mr. J. Harrison (deceased), in addition to the existing managers, the Revs. F. K. Freeston and W. G. Tarrant, and Mr. G. W. Chitty; the Rev. W. G. Tarrant to be appointed treasurer, and Mr. H. Gimson auditor. All communications respecting the fund should be sent to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, 53, West-over-road, Wandsworth, S.W.

London: Boys' Own Brigade.—The London Battalion Annual Council meeting will be held at Stamford-street Chapel, on Monday, December 16, at 8.45 p.m.

London: Islington.—At the autumnal congregational meeting held at Unity Church on Wednesday, December 4, a welcome was extended to the Rev. E. E. Coleman, M.A., and the Pioneer Preachers. Dr. Tudor Jones presided, and gave an account of the origin of the movement. Mr. Alfred Wilson, chairman of the committee, the Rev. W. Wooding, B.A., and Mr. James Waters also spoke, and the Rev. E. E. Coleman and the five Pioneer Preachers suitably responded.

London: Kilburn.—A Sale of Work in connection with the Unitarian Church was held on December 5 and 6 by the Ladies' Congregational Working Party. It was opened on the first day by Miss Edith Preston, with Mr.

Mowbray Marras in the chair. A novel feature of the sale was a Sunday school stall, well stocked with Christmas cards and toys, at which scholars served. The total receipts amounted to nearly £66.

Manchester: Willert-street.—Dr. Mellone, the Principal of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, was the special preacher at the Sunday school anniversary services in connection with the Willert-street Domestic Mission on Sunday, December 8. At the close of the afternoon service Dr. Mellone distributed the prizes, and at the evening service addressed the parents and teachers.

Norwich.—On Thursday, December 5, the annual Sale of Work was held in connection with the Octagon Chapel to aid the funds of the Martineau Memorial Hall. Mr. Charles Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, performed the opening ceremony, Mr. W. H. Scott presiding. The Rev. Mortimer Rowe, the minister, also spoke; and Mr. James Mottram, who proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Hawksley, referred to the local indebtedness to him and his father in connection with the Norwich waterworks. The proceeds of the sale amounted to about £79.

Shrewsbury.—Mr. R. G. F. Vickery (son of Mr. W. Vickery, J.P., of Shrewsbury), who recently passed the final examination of the Incorporated Law Society, has been awarded Honours at the Honours Examination held in connection therewith. Mr. R. Vickery is an old Willastonian. He was the first boy to enter the school at the opening in September, 1900.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A MEMORIAL TO MAZZINI.

A bronze tablet containing a bust of Mazzini in bas-relief is to be affixed on December 14 to No. 5, Hatton-garden, where the great Italian patriot held his classes and conferences when he was in London. The inscription is as follows:—"In this house Giuseppe Mazzini, the Apostle of modern Democracy, inspired Young Italy with the ideal of the unity, independence and regeneration of his country." The tablet will be unveiled by the Italian Ambassador.

PSYCHOLOGY IN THE SCHOOL.

It has long been recognised by education authorities that the classification of mentally deficient or merely dull children in schools needs to be supervised very carefully by experts, and they will welcome the appointment by the London Education Committee of an official psychologist who will assist the headmasters in this task. It is a recognition of a very practical kind of the difficulties which meet the teacher at every turn, especially in regard to those peculiar cases where it is scarcely possible to draw the line between ordinary stupidity and real mental incapacity. The children whose brains are really defective present very special and various mental failings which we cannot afford to ignore, but the children who may be called merely slow-witted have also to be considered, for they are not susceptible to general school treatment, and it is thought that those whom the new expert includes under this category will in future be taught separately in special classes held in the schools.

THE HEAD OF WINDERMERE.

Canon Rawnsley, hon. secretary of the National Trust, states that the whole of the sum, £4,000, required for the purchase of the meadowland at the head of Windermere and the site of the as yet unexcavated Roman Fort in the Borrans Field has been obtained, and that the transference of the property to the National Trust is now being carried through. Owing to the public-spirited efforts of the residents in the neighbourhood, and to the help of nearly 200 subscribers in various parts of the country, the site is now secure. The head of Windermere is safe from disfigurement, and the right to land or wander on the shore for a frontage of 600 yards of river and lake has been obtained for the public. Funds will still be needed for the scientific exploration of the Fort, and for these the National Trust will look to those interested in Roman history and archæology.

A RED CROSS STAMP.

The British Red Cross Society is issuing a special stamp with a design by Bernard Partridge, with a view to helping its funds and enabling it to carry on its work of mercy in connection with the Balkan War. The pitiable condition of the sick and wounded is not yet realised in this country, and the Society believe that many people would like to purchase a few of these stamps, according to their means, as some small contribution to the expenses which are being incurred in keeping up the full supply of doctors and nurses and medical stores on the field of battle. As these stamps will, no doubt, be kept in memory of the terrible times through which Eastern Europe is now passing, they will be of historic interest in years to come. They are issued in three varieties: green at 1d., blue at 1s., and brown at 5s., and can be obtained from the British Red Cross Society (Department for Red Cross Stamps), c/o S. H. Benson, Ltd., Kingsway Hall, W.C.

SUNDAY FESTIVALS AT CROSBY HALL.

The last of the Sunday Festivals will be held at Crosby Hall, More's Garden, Beaufort-street, Chelsea, on December 15, at 7.15 for 7.30. Miss Joyce Tarring and Mrs. Schofield will be the soloists, and ancient carols will be rendered by the Utopian Choir. An address will be delivered by Miss Alice Buckton. Children will dance in semi-darkness before the lighting of the Tree, and friends possessing lanterns of any kind are requested to bring them, ready trimmed, to contribute to the effectiveness of the simple pageant.

A FAIRY DINNER.

The desire on the part of grown-up people to return to the pleasures of their childhood seems to be on the increase. Last week there was the Pantomime Ball, at which all sorts of notabilities, wives of Cabinet ministers, hard-headed soldiers, artists, politicians, and serious professional men disported themselves in the guise of nursery-tale or Arabian Nights' heroes and heroines. We now learn that the Irish Literary Society recently gave a unique and interesting dinner at a London hotel, when the table was decorated with fairy dolls, fairy bells and fairy horns. The guest of the evening was, most appropriately, Dr. Evans Wentz, who secured a literary degree at Rennes, and a science degree at Oxford, for his thesis proving that fairies actually exist. After his address some delightful "fairy songs" were sung.

THE GOLDEN RULE CALENDAR.

The publication of a "Golden Rule Calendar" gives all advocates of peace an excellent opportunity for furthering their cause in a simple and acceptable manner at this season of goodwill. The Calendar has been compiled by Mrs. Fox, whose father, the late Henry Pease, of Darlington, went to St. Petersburg in the interests of peace just before the outbreak of the Crimean War and was received by the Czar. It contains, besides quotations from well-known sources, extracts from speeches by Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Asquith, the Emperor of Germany, the Baroness Suttner, the Bishop of Hereford and others, in addition to some special contributions. The Calendar is printed in good type, with a quotation for every day in the year, and is suitable for hanging on the wall. It can be obtained from Mr. A. L. Humphreys, 187, Piccadilly, and all booksellers, price 6d.

EDUCATION IN NIGERIA.

An interesting account of the progress of education in Northern Nigeria is given by the Acting-Governor in his annual report. The Nassarawa School, near Kano, which has only been established two years, has 450 scholars, and now that the suspicions of the more enlightened chiefs have been overcome, the difficulty is how to find accommodation for the number of pupils who are anxious to obtain instruction. The most encouraging part of the work is, indeed, the response of the natives themselves, and high hopes are entertained for the future if the principle of preserving the native, and gradually educating him along lines adapted to his mental and physical condition is not abandoned.

THE HINDU IN CANADA.

We learn from The Aryan, a paper devoted to the interests of the Hindus in the British Dominions, that the labour famine in Canada, of which we have heard lately, is becoming very serious. The Dominion requires 55,000 harvesters to reap and harvest the crops, and the railway companies and farmers are offering every inducement to foreigners—Italians, Greeks, Slavs, and other city dwellers who are not used to farm life at all to go over for this work. "Many farmers have asked us for Sikh help," says The Aryan, "but owing to unjust and indiscriminating laws the Sikhs, who are born farmers, cannot enter this free country—free to every nation under the sun, but not to those who are under the same flag." The Sikhs, of whom some 4,000 are domiciled in British Columbia, are a fine, hard-working set of men, and born agriculturists. Yet, as a correspondent in the Daily News and Leader recently pointed out, "during last year only one Hindu was admitted to Canada. In the first five months of this year 2,000 Chinese were admitted."

OUR CALENDAR.

It is requested that notice of any alteration in the Calendar be sent to the Publisher not later than Thursday Morning.

N.B.—The name of the Minister of the Church is in all cases inserted, unless instructions are received to the contrary by Thursday morning before the date of issue.

HACKNEY New Gravel Pit Church

New School Buildings Fund.*

THE Committee and Congregation are appealing for funds to provide new and enlarged accommodation for the Schools and Institutions of the Church.

The School is one of the largest among our London Churches, has over 200 scholars on the books, and has quite outgrown the rooms. The buildings are over 100 years old and inconveniently planned. The Scheme for new buildings and enlargement provides:—

- (1) New Class Rooms.
- (2) Rooms for a Boys' Club.
- (3) A Church Hall.
- (4) Better accommodation for the Chapel-keeper.

Contributions should be sent to

Mr. J. S. HARDING (Treasurer),
40, Darenth-road, Stamford Hill, N.

The following contributions have already been received or promised:—

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

News and Advertisements for our next issue must reach the office not later than noon on Tuesday.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Peace Conference met to inaugurate its deliberations on Monday, and adjourned on Tuesday in order to enable the Turkish delegates to consult their Government. The less speculation that takes place in the press upon any causes for delay the better. The difficulties of States like private quarrels are often best composed behind closed doors without the irritating comments of spectators. Sir Edward Grey's dignified words of welcome to the delegates were an assurance of good-will. "By accomplishing peace" he said, "you will secure the respect of the whole of Europe." The replies made by Dr. Daneff, ex-Prime Minister of Bulgaria and M. Venizelos, the Prime Minister of Greece, were couched in terms of cordial gratitude for the friendliness of the welcome, and made special reference to the pacific atmosphere of London so propitious to the success of their mission.

THE inaugural meeting of the British Committee for the celebration of the centenary of the Treaty of Ghent, which was signed on December 24, 1814, and our hundred years' peace with the United States, was held at the Mansion House on Wednesday afternoon. Earl Grey, who presided, pointed out that similar committees had been formed in the United States and Canada. Among the interesting proposals which were being considered were the placing of a statue of George Washington in Westminster Abbey or Westminster Hall, the purchase of Selgrave Manor in Northamptonshire, the ancestral home of the Washington family, and the erection of a monument symbolical of the unity of purpose which binds the two peoples together in the best available site in London. An elaborate scheme of educational effort is also under consideration.

* * *

SOME concessions were made by the Government on the financial clauses of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill on Wednesday night, but they do not seem to have created any temper of conciliation in the Opposition or brought the whole question nearer to a settlement by consent. There was considerable force in the plea of Mr. Silvester Horne that the cathedrals should be retained as national property and be available from time to time for other than Anglican services, and we think that the Church authorities would have acted in the best interests alike of religion and good feeling if they had accepted it. We are glad to see that there is to be no weakening of the proposal to hand over the control of the burial-grounds to the parish councils. It is a system which works smoothly in Ireland, where the churchyards are used by all denominations without any of the vexatious formalities and respect for the rights of the incumbent, which are imposed in England. Little acts of unfriendliness or officious interference in connection with a funeral cut very deep and sometimes bring great discredit upon religion in rural districts. It is well that all occasion for them should be removed.

At the annual meeting of the Penal Reform League, which was held in London last week, Sir John Macdonnell made the interesting suggestion that the time might come when it would be regarded as part of the duty of the Home Secretary to give an annual review of the progress that had been made in the struggle between the forces of the repression of crime and the far more fruitful forces of the prevention of crime. Or perhaps, he said, the task might devolve more appropriately on the Minister of Education, for crime was connected with nothing more than education. He expressed his opinion that on the whole the administration of the law, far from deteriorating, was improving. The annual report in referring to the penalty of flogging under the Criminal Law Amendment Act describes it as a concession to public ideas of retribution. "Right principles," it is pleaded, "point to an effectual method of treatment for the safeguarding of society as well as the reclamation of the offender—namely, retention under effective educative supervision—of various kinds and degrees according to the character of the offender—to be continued as long as the safety of society needs it."

THERE is something very beautiful in their dignified simplicity in the closing words of Dean Kitchin's will:

"Let no one make any memoir or biography of me: may my funeral be as simple as possible, without flowers or any show; a few wild flowers might be scattered over my grave. Let my burial be as little mournful as possible: the earthly end of a poor sinner who dies thankful to the Almighty God for a long and very happy life."

The words were prompted by a deep and true instinct. In the presence of the great mystery of death the voice of panegyric should be silent and everything be ordered without any kind of display. All we need is the familiar words of Scripture and the prayer of trust, as we commit another frail human life to the mercy and judgment of God.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

(Written to a German melody.)

WITH the morn

There cometh gladness ;
 Christmas mirth
 O'er the earth
 Lifts the veil of sadness :

Joy is ours ;

Oh, friends, remember,
 He who sings
 With him brings Sunshine in December.

Jesus came

With full salvation ;
 Peace and light,
 Truth and right,
 For our acceptance.

Therefore we

Who love his story,
 Follow all
 At his call
 And give God the glory.

Sing His Praise

In happy chorus ;
 To the end
 He our Friend
 Ever watcheth o'er us.

Love is here,

And Love still liveth ;
 God His grace
 To our race
 Bountifully giveth.

J. L. HAIGH.

SOUL TO SOUL.

LET us be friends ! For all the wrong was great,
 I think our souls in nowise shared that sin.
 Something without us raged with wrath and hate,
 But, ah, there was the peace of heaven within.

Pent as we are in this poor house of flesh Times there must be when passions work their will,
 And anger strives more surely to immesh
 With baffling words the soul it cannot kill.

Times there must be of battle fierce and long,
 Times of lost hope when pride alone uplifts
 Her dust-crowned head, and hate alone is strong—
 But somewhere in the lowering sky are rifts

Of blue that cheer the Watcher through those bars
 She cannot pass, and to remembrance bring
 Her immemorial kinship with the stars
 And cosmic source of every living thing.

Then she can meet with fearless eyes those eyes
 That yearn towards her through the obscuring veil
 Of earth's illusions—she, the true, the wise,
 One with the perfect law that shall prevail.

Unsoiled by sin though sin her gaoler be,
 Unhurt by pangs that stop the body's breath ;
 Patient through all that sunders Thee and Me,
 Till we outsoar the worlds of birth and death.

LAURA ACKROYD.

SONGS OF A BURIED CITY.

(VIROCONIUM.)

I.

THE WORD AND THE THING.

My friend, why struggle with that ponderous tome ?
 Not thus will hidden treasure be revealed,
 Not thus the magic casket be unsealed :
 The key lies elsewhere—in your very home !
 Take spade, and dig down in this English loam,
 Here, in a corner of your paddock-field,
 Then gaze in wonder on its harvest yield—
 The living footprints of Imperial Rome !

So may a man peruse, for many a year,
 Book upon book to solve Love's mystery,
 In search of knowledge where no knowledge lies :
 Until one day a whisper breathes, " Seek here ! "
 And what he sought he finds, amazedly,
 All in a moment, in a maiden's eyes.

THE CITY UNDER THE CORN.

" WHAT is there under the corn, lad—
 What is there under the corn ? "

" Maistly roots
 An' stalks an' shoots—
 That's what's under the corn. "

" What else is under the corn, lad—
 What else is under the corn ? "

" I reckon there's worms
 As wriggles an' squirms—
 There allus is under the corn. "

" Is that all under the corn, lad—
 Is that all under the corn ? "

" Why, there'll be moles
 As makes their holes :
 There's one just there in the corn ! "

" And what is that shining red, lad,
 On the mole-heap there in the corn ? "

" 'Tis a bit o' pot
 As he must ha' bro't
 From somewheres under the corn. "

" Does your father find bits like this, lad, When he's ploughing before the corn ? "

" Ay, that he do,
 An' other things too,
 When he's ploughing afore the corn. "

" And why does the share get bent, lad, When you plough the field for the corn ? "

" Oftentimes it'll strike
 On a hard thing, like,
 When we ploughs the field for the corn ! "

" And what do you think they are, lad, Those hard things under the corn ? "

" Why, bits o' wall
 An' I dunno what all,
 As is hidden under the corn. "

" And what are walls doing there, lad, Hidden beneath the corn ? "

" Why, they do say
 That once on a day
 There was houses where now there's corn. "

" Ay, houses are under the corn, lad—
 Houses are under the corn ;
 For a city fair
 Lies buried there ;
 That's what is under the corn ! "

THE FESTIVAL OF MEMORY AND HOPE.

ON Christmas Day memory and hope unite in one dazzling point of light. Then we know their equal place in a religion which is to save our souls alive, and have no wish to tear them apart. But it is not always so. It is to the past that many people turn with eager eyes, hugging it close to their hearts and filling it with their fondest dreams, on the day when the voice of the prophet is heard in the land and the ancient landmarks are moved out of their place. The past to them is a refuge, not an inspiration, and the future the abode of fear. What strange survivals of a vanished day they seem to these others, the heralds of progress, who move with swift feet through the world, crying as they go—"The past is over and dead, this is the day which the LORD hath made, and to-morrow the kingdom cometh." How quick they are to destroy in order that they may begin to build! How impatient when men still linger among quaint symbols and hallowed customs! How confident that they are the children of light! Only they forget that a religion which has lost its memory has also forfeited its hopes, and that a God whom they have discovered to-day and will help to live to-morrow is not God at all.

We all know these people. They are among those who profess and call themselves Christians. They worship in different churches. They denounce one another in rival party organs. Sometimes they meet and glare into one another's eyes and part without any understanding. Then, once more, in the silent revolution of the year, it is Christmas Day, and the DIVINE CHILD stands in the midst, and lo! he stretches out both his hands and claims them all. For the devotee of tradition he rekindles the lamp of hope, and for the rebellious children of the dawn he makes fragrant the paths of memory. But he does it with such gentle pleadings that they hardly know that their heart is changed within them. The radiant light in his eyes, the laughter on his lips, the steps ever running forward to greet the surprise of a new day, who can mark them and not yield to their enchantment, till hope is born again out of the ashes of despair, and the symbol of religion is no longer a closed book but a beckoning hand. And these customs of an elder day which gather around his festival, the snatches of ancient song, the quaint ritual acts, the memorials of the childhood of our race blending with the story of the birth of CHRIST—few hearts are insensible to their appeal. They pluck at us on the side of our affections, and with the first strains of "Glory to God in the highest," all the defences of logic are blown to the winds and the latter-day prophet becomes the best traditionalist of them all.

If we allow ourselves to meditate a little more deeply on the subject, we shall find that this healing influence of Christmas rests in the last resort upon something more potent than the quiet reversal of ordinary moods. Religion, like all the other great interests of human life, is a matter of three tenses, past, present and future. We can, to a certain extent, hold them apart in our minds and yield to our inclination to dwell in one compartment exclusively. But there are moments when these crutches of thought seem to dissolve into nothingness. God utters his voice. He unveils the splendours of his light and love. He overwhelms the soul with the treasures of his grace and crushes earthly desires into the dust. We pass beyond the moods and tenses of our thinking, and our fellowship is with Him, who is and was and ever shall be. JESUS CHRIST is a Revealer of God in this sense. He is himself a timeless moment in the experience of humanity, and therefore the reconciler of the discords of time. It is seldom indeed that we think of Christianity in this way. It is more familiar to us as a subject of doctrinal debate, or as one among several competing schemes of conduct, or as a system of ethics carefully trimmed to suit contemporary civilisation. But on Christmas Day the veil that lies upon our hearts is done away; the Eternal Life is manifested; the sordid values of the world lose their meaning; and for a few moments, almost timeless in their happiness, we find it possible to live in the presence of God.

THE Rev. Joseph Wood has marked the close of his long ministry in Birmingham by publishing five addresses, which he has gathered together under the attractive title "The Vision Splendid." It is a dainty booklet, which is likely to be in great demand among his many friends as a Christmas gift. (Birmingham: T. Smith & Son, Cherry-street, 1s.)

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

TALKS WITH LIBELLUS.

I FOUND Libellus, as usual, in his library. As soon as I entered he turned to me with a look of triumph. He was handling a new treasure, an old edition of some seventeenth century French classic, which had just arrived. He would have wandered off into one of his quaint literary talks, with me as a delighted listener, but my time was short and I had other things in mind. I wish I could give you a sketch of Libellus among his books. He suits no other surroundings so well, except when he is the centre of an old-fashioned children's party. A good book and a little child are among the most precious gifts of God, is one of his favourite sayings. But he is no bookworm who has sucked the dust of centuries into his veins. The pedantries of the collector have little charm for him. Books are his friends, his boon companions, and their spacious wisdom has even moulded his face. He is too witty ever to be a bore, too far above the vulgar ambitions of men to forget to be kind.

"Oh! it is new books that you are after, books for Christmas presents," he said, with a humorous shrug, as he placed a slip of paper in the page where he had been reading. "Now, do you really think that new books are worth considering? Why, you cannot know anything of their real value till they are 50 years old. The greatest event of the publishing season goes to the lumber-room in six months, and another literary firework will be in the ascendant." I took this banter quite cheerfully, for I knew well the table in one corner of the library where the new books were piled, and I had often caught Libellus in the act of cutting them with unmistakable ardour.

"Of course, if your friends have any sense," he began, "they will want you to give them poetry; not the little versifiers who chirrup like swallows under the eaves, though they are pleasant enough on a May morning, but the regal singers, who clasp hands with Shelley and Milton. Here, for instance, is the poetry of George Meredith, gathered for the first time into one volume. It has notes, though the best poetry is better without them, by one of his chief lovers, G. M. Trevelyan. I don't like it," he added, "like my row of odd volumes up there. A collected edition in one volume reminds me of a sepulchre. It is often the end of contemporary fame and the beginning of smart depreciation. Yes, I know that Meredith is not for all tastes. The city-bred man is baffled by his ethereal passion for Earth his Mother; and he often stumbles in obscurity. With all the wealth of poetry in him he seldom got his medium quite right. But listen to this:—

Bury thy sorrows, and they shall rise
As souls to the immortal skies,
And there look down like mothers' eyes.

But let thy joys be fresh as flowers
That suck the honey of the showers,
And bloom alike on huts and towers.

So shall thy days be sweet and bright ;
Solemn and sweet thy starry night,
Conscious of love each change of light."

But already my eyes had fallen greedily on another book, resplendent in a gold patterned cover with strange emblems. It was a new edition of Poems by W. B. Yeats. "Surely," I said, "it must be false all this talk about the decadence of poetry, when there is still a market for Yeats." "You are right," Libellus replied with enthusiasm, "it is nothing but the pure delight in poetry for its own sake that can ever draw readers to him. He suggests no problems and answers no questions and his dramas are little more than fairy palaces, where nothing happens in the normal human way. His work is of imagination all compact, and his verse just singing, liquid sweet. But I dread his habit of revising his poetry. In this volume there is one consoling sentence, 'I have not again retouched the lyric poems of my youth, fearing some stupidity in my middle years.' That I am sure is infallibly right. We all get stupid, in the poetic sense, as we grow old.

"But here are two Irish books that I want to show you." I was waiting for him to say this, for Libellus is above all things an Irish patriot. It accounts for many things, perhaps for a certain obstinacy in some of his literary preferences. The first was the "Poem Book of the Gael," selected and edited by Miss Eleanor Hull, "a fit companion," he said, "for Kuno Meyer's volume of 'Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry,' published last year, but covering a much wider field. Miss Hull has written many of the translations herself, and look at these delightful capital letters from the Lindisfarne Gospels and other Celtic manuscripts, scattered prodigally through its pages. The beauty of this early Irish poetry and its exquisite feeling for nature, never lose their surprise for me. Listen; where in the Europe of the seventh century will you find anything like this song of Manchan the Hermit?" He half-chanted the words, in a way that reminded me of a deep-voiced woman, whom I once heard at a lecture by W. B. Yeats:—

I wish, O Son of the Living God, O Ancient, Eternal King,

For a hidden hut in the wilderness, a simple secluded thing.

The all-blithe lithe little lark in his place, chanting his lightsome lay;

The calm, clear pool of the Spirit's grace, washing my sins away.

A wide, wild woodland on every side, its shades the nursery

Of glad-voiced songsters, who at day-dawn chant their secret psalm for me.

A pleasant church with an Altar-cloth, where Christ sits at the board,
And a shining candle shedding its ray on the white words of the Lord.

Rough raiment of tweed, enough for my need, this will my King allow;
And I to be sitting praying to God under every leafy bough.

" 'I have learned,' said the Philosopher,
'that the head does not hear anything until the heart has listened, and that what the heart knows to-day the head will understand to-morrow.' 'All the birds of the world are singing in my soul,' said the bearded man, 'and I bless you because you have filled my heart with hope and pride.' No," Libellus continued, "those are not words of ancient poetry, but they come from a book which belongs to the same world. A man who cannot feel the sheer mad delight of Mr. James Stephens' 'The Crock of Gold' must leave these Irish things alone; they are not for him. It is inspired nonsense which is often the highest wisdom. I can't tell you what it is about, for it is about everything and nothing, and its world is one of fairies and leprecauns and talking animals and bewitched maidens, and philosophers who are caught in the toils of their own talk and how they can be delivered. For the dazzling beauty of parts of it and the whimsical genius of the whole, there has been nothing quite like it for many a day. It is going into a special niche among my treasures."

"But," I pleaded at last, "some of my friends are people of quite pedestrian tastes. Novels," I meekly suggested. But Libellus vowed that he would have none of them, at least I had better ask the advice of the young man at the circulating library; he would be sure to know what everybody was reading. "Surely," he continued, "some of them would read a pleasant volume of literary essays. What can be a more pleasant companion with a bright fire on a winter evening? Here for instance is 'Among My Books,' by Frederic Harrison. You will find literary gossip there of the finest vintage and pleasant tracts of unfamiliar history, and of course the stately shade of Auguste Comte as chief guest at the feast. 'Portraits and Sketches' by Edmund Gosse will suit the same taste. Ah, I see that you have not forgotten some severe things I said about 'Father and Son.' It is true that while I admired much of the writing in that book, there was something about it, a sense of prying into the intimacies of other people's lives, which I did not like. But there is nothing of that kind here. The essays on Swinburne and Mandell Creighton and several others in the volume have the pleasant touch of intimacy, but there is nothing that even a purist like myself could wish unsaid."

I rose to go, but Libellus held me a moment longer. "I must show you my new picture-book," he said. "You know how I revel in pictures." He opened "Everybody's St. Francis," by Maurice F. Egan, illustrated by that excellent French artist M. Boutet de Monvel. "Look at these simple washes of plain colour and the equally effective sketches in black and white. He has caught the gaiety and friendliness of the Saint, and his caressing affection for birds and flowers and all the other innocent angels of God. And what wisdom he has shown in not trying to draw the dread scene of the Stigmata." I felt that my visit had not been in vain. Here was a present which could not fail to please my child-friends, and some others whom I know who keep child-like hearts.

POSTSCRIPT.

The next morning's post brought me the following note from Libellus. It is so like

II.

IN a previous article I raised the question of the "final" religion which is likely to emerge from the struggle and competitions of the world religions. I personally believe, from the evidence of its past history and of its present spiritual qualities, that Christianity at its best will prove to be that ultimate world-wide catholic religion—quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus. This cannot be proved. It is a matter of faith, perhaps of instinct and intuition. It is at any rate an estimate of worth, a judgment of value on which I am prepared to stake everything.

But though it cannot be proved ("nothing worthy proving can be proven nor yet disproven") there are indications that such a forecast is not entirely without supports in fact. Some of these are historical. We see how in the past Christianity did as a matter of fact prove its capacity to absorb and assimilate what was vital in the ancient religions of Greece and Rome. We see, too, how on the whole it escaped the baser elements in Mohammedanism, and preserved what was best in it by virtue of its inheritance of the higher Monotheism of Israel. We see how a progressive nation like Japan is rapidly throwing off its ancestral faiths and becoming in part sceptical, agnostic, materialistic and secular, and then gradually feeling after God (even as rationalistic France is doing), and finding Him in a liberal type of Christianity. Hundreds of Japanese students educated in our English and American Universities are coming to the conclusion that Buddhism is too pessimistic and too negative to inspire and nourish their advancing culture. Many of them see in Christianity the only redemption from the increasing immorality and untrustworthiness of their commercial life—though our own commercial standards are none too high. In India, while the East has much to give us, yet by the intrinsic power of Western civilisation—whether we admit its superiority or not—by virtue of Western government, and Western science, and Western trade, the Christian religion will influence the East more and more. The mere novelty of Eastern thought, coupled with the fascination of the doctrine of re-incarnation, tends to make men momentarily exaggerate its influence and value. The main current is still, and will be, from West to East, not from East to West. Christianity may have to undergo some considerable change, but it will not lose its self-identity as a historical religion nor will it lose its central supreme and decisive loyalty to Jesus Christ, even though Gotama may appear in its calendar of saints. Indeed, Christianity has already passed through the test of surviving actual collision with the Eastern mind and has to some extent been rendered immune from further inoculation.

Moreover, Christianity is historically unique. At this Advent season it is worth bearing this in mind. No other religion was ever so favourably circumstanced in its origin as to become the inheritor of the greatest and strongest of all the ancient empires of the world. If Rome was suckled on the dugs of a wolf, Christianity born of Judaism was suckled on the very blood of the Roman Empire. The Empire became in truth the nutriment of the Christian faith. The Church fed and fattened upon it. It turned its inspiration into its own life. The best in Greek culture and philosophy, the strongest and sternest in Roman government and jurisprudence and organisation entered into the heart of Christianity. It is even now in large measure the vitality and the iron in its veins. In addition to this, it took in what was vital in the Egyptian and Eastern mysteries and cults. Their mysticism is still the gleam of speculation in its eyes. Of no other religion can all this be said or anything really parallel to this in spiritual significance.

Again, geographically as well as historically, Christianity is unique. It was born on the frontiers of East and West. Palestine felt the shock of the impact of the ancient oriental races and the Western world. The floods of their diverse civilisations ran backwards and forwards over the Holy Land and irrigated its life. The lights and shadows of the East and of the West marched and countermarched over the hills and plains of Galilee. Jesus Christ, on any sane estimate of his personality, was a world historical genius, born in the one territory in all the earth where East and West most thoroughly mingled and reacted on each other, and yet a territory held by a race so consolidated by a national monotheistic religion that it was never swept into the welter of a vague and colourless cosmopolitanism. What Christianity was at the beginning, namely, the outcome of East and West, it will also be at the end. When races and religions have united more sympathetically and worked out more fully their influences in a complete and thorough assimilation, then, I believe, Christianity will stand out as the Catholic or universal religion. It will do that not because of any of the historical or geographical advantages of the past, though no man of insight will underestimate the value of these advantages; it will do that because of the victorious character of its central ideas.

No other religion in the world has with the same clearness and intensity grasped these three essentials of a world religion, Brotherhood, Fatherhood, Sonship. These are precisely the world-conquering ideas. They constitute the key to the solution of our private, social, imperial and international problems. And, last of all, the innermost secret of the triumph of Christianity, in the past, in the present, and, as I have no shadow of doubt, in the future, is this—that all these ideas are actualised, focussed, and incarnated in Jesus himself. In a deeper and truer than the orthodox sense Christianity is the religion of an incarnate Personality. It is the religion of God in Man and of Man in God. We worship no Mohammedan Sultan exalted to the heavens, no merely Jewish Jehovah, no Eternal order or universal law, or a Great Wheel of Destiny, but the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. God in Christ, but the same God that is also manifested in some degree in all men everywhere and through all time—the true light that lighteth every man coming into the world. There is no other God but this in all the world, in all races, in all religions. To Him be the glory for ever!

"EAGER HEART."

It is scarcely a matter for wonder that the message of "Eager-Heart," several performances of which are being given this week at the Church House, Westminster, is finding acceptance among an increasing number of people year by year as Christmas-time comes round, and that it is now being carried not only across the American Continent, but as far as the ancient cities of India. It is derived from one of the many Christ-child legends which we love to recall at this season, and it is presented in a religious setting with which we of the Western nations are specially familiar; nevertheless it has a universal application which makes it quite possible for men and women of the most diverse creeds to receive and understand it. After all, there is no country in the world where love and gentleness find no response; where pomp and arrogance and the pride of the flesh do not bring disillusionment in their train; where humble homes fail to offer spontaneous hospitality to those whom the worldly often treats with contempt, and where the mother and child, symbolising the eternal mystery of life and love, are not worshipped and adored in some form or other. For this reason those who try, as the author of "Eager-Heart" has done, to take up once more the parable of pity in her human dress caring for the poor and outcast, while the lures of pleasure and the trumpets of fame are unheeded, is doing much to keep the soul of man fresh and unsullied still amid the preoccupation with external things which mars his peace and shortens his days.

It is not easy to do this. There is a constant risk of declining to bathos and sentimentality, even when the mind is set on the eternal truths which such plays are intended to teach. But here sincerity of purpose and delicacy of perception are the only guides. The least self-consciousness on the part of the author, the slightest striving after artistic effect, merely for the sake of artistic effect, defeat their object immediately. An earnest desire to present some inspiring thought amid surroundings which shall heighten the effect of its appeal without distracting the eye with a confusion of form and colour will indeed achieve all that is necessary, and bring about that harmony between ideas and their visible embodiment which is often sought for in vain in an ordinary theatre. "Eager-Heart" has been both written and produced in this spirit. It is manifestly the outcome of reverent feeling, a sense of the unifying power of religious emotions and traditions, and the joy of service to mankind. The result is that the audience follow it with quiet and attentive minds, finally, as they join in the old Latin hymn, "O come, O come, Emmanuel," adding their contribution with full hearts to the praise and homage rendered to the Lord of Life.

TWO SONGS OF NATIVITY.

ELI, the priest, thought that Hannah was drunk. He did not know the secret sorrow of her life. Many would have jumped to his conclusion. There is a general readiness to judge by appearances, a common inclination to pronounce hasty judgment, and from this failing even priests are not exempt. God only knows the hidden battles, the conflicts in the dark, the anguish that is so seldom revealed. He alone understands the limitations and handicaps—physical, nervous, mental, and moral—of those who are so energetically condemned by an unsympathetic world. The understanding soul makes allowances.

The critic in a hurry ignores the life behind the scenes. Hannah's anguish sprang from an unrealised hope, a desire to express, create, give, and serve, that was unfulfilled. And this spirit in prison, this bird beating its wings against cruel cage-wires, is a type of that large class of individuals in whose souls has burned a great longing to serve the world as reformers, teachers, scientists, explorers, musicians, patriots, yet who are held back by the limitations of their circumstances from making any such contribution to human history. Picture the undeveloped wealth in every department of knowledge, culture, and progress, frustrated and paralysed by a cruel environment, or checked by personal affliction, or family responsibility, or some like cause. Imagine what might have been! Here is an ardent student whose promising career is blighted by a nervous breakdown. Here is a man who could have incited his fellows to a glowing enthusiasm for social progress plodding unknown in the sordid task of paying a parent's debts. Here is another, moved by a divine impulse to offer himself to the Christian ministry, prevented, on the threshold of a promising life of usefulness, from pursuing his mission by his conscientious refusal to preach what to him does not ring true. Here are men and women with the souls of musicians, artists, or inventors, condemned to the slavery of city offices, unable to express their true thoughts and feelings, eating out their hearts in labour that makes small call for initiative or enthusiasm. No wonder some folk seem cold, nervous, reticent, indifferent, anti-social. These unlovely qualities come with dying hopes and barren harvests. In those very real pictures of such experiences found in the works of Mark Rutherford and George Gissing, is found telling expression of the inner emotions of such lives, emotions much akin to those of Hannah, emotions of conquerors, builders, makers of history, held back by the logic of events. Is there meaning in this apparent waste? Do the castles decay and the plans fall to pieces as incidents in a greater plan? God knows. But the Hannah who sang, "My heart rejoiceth in the Lord, mine horn is exalted in the Lord," was a different woman from the Hannah whom Eli the priest thought drunk. She could boast a realised hope, an answered prayer. The barren had become a mother, and the mother had consecrated her offspring to God's service. The burden of her song of thanksgiving was the conviction that God had a place in her life, that her history was sacred history, her being part of a larger, indissolubly related to a higher. She was linked to a great future, her home life was part of the national life, part of the life of God. Great songs express joy in the fact of God in human experience, and in the anticipation of a great future. Hannah could not explain the feeling in her heart that her own little life was connected somehow with the mystery of things. She sang because she felt at home in God, because hers was the opportunity of contributing to the progressive history of the ages.

Her song reminds us that there should be joyfulness and thanksgiving at the advent of every child born to humanity. Motherhood to-day is often regarded as a trial and a burden, a thing to be shirked and evaded by fair means or foul. The love of pleasure and ease on the one hand, and the bitterness of poverty on the other, account for this departure from true human instincts. An appalling proportion of the infants born to this nation die in their first year. Many who just escape spend their days in pain and neglect. In the pottery districts "not more than 20 per cent. of living babies are born to the women employed in the dipping-houses." To many a mother in a crowded factory-town Hannah's song would be a cruel mockery. "Another mouth to feed," is her comment, "and God knows where the food will come from!"

Mary's song at the birth of Jesus has an interest quite independent from controversies concerning the theory of the virgin-birth. It reminds us that it is the humble who produce the great, that true greatness springs from humility, that God uses lowly instruments, that He understands the misunderstood. It also tells us that a nation's greatness lies in its homes, that its future dwells in the breasts of its mothers. It is not suggested that the song was an original production, but an adaptation of one of the songs learnt by Mary as a child. It contains elements of true poetry and prophecy, freely quoted from the Hebrew Scriptures, and has been named "The Birth Song of Democracy."

It glories in the future. That is the secret of all true democratic poetry. The sorrow of the present is preparing for the joy of a great to-morrow. This element of the Messianic vision is seen in Edward Carpenter's "England Arise":—

By your young children's eyes so red with weeping,

By their white faces aged with want and fear,

By the dark cities where your babes are creeping

Naked of joy and all that makes life dear;

From each wretched slum

Let the loud cry come—

Arise, O England, for the day is here.

It is seen in those lines of Gerald Massey, "written during the bad days of the Chartist movement":—

'Tis weary watching wave by wave, yet still the tide heaves onward;

We climb like corals, grave by grave, to reach a pathway sunward;

We're beaten back in many a fray, but newer strength we borrow,

And where the vanguard comes to-day, the rear will rest to-morrow.

Build up heroic lives, and all be like a sheathen sabre,

Ready to flash at duty's call, oh, chivalry of Labour!

Triumph and toil are twins, though they be singly born to sorrow,

And 'tis the martyrdom to-day brings victory to-morrow.

Perhaps, however, the most significant lesson of this song lies in the fact of the singer's influence upon the life and character of the babe, whose birth brought such joy to her soul. How great has always been the help rendered to those who have stood in the forefront of the world's history by men and women upon whom small share of the honour due to them has fallen! Where would our great statesmen be but for the faithful but often unrecognised labours of their private secretaries? Both Mr. Gladstone and the Marquis of Salisbury bore frequent and unstinted testimony to the unselfish and constant aid they received from their wives in their work. Emerson paid the highest tribute to the counsel and encouragement, backed by personal example, of his mother, and the aunt who often lived with them. These are not isolated instances, and lead us to conclude that, although at some moments in his career his mother grievously misunderstood him, yet Mary's influence helped to make her son what he was, and her character helped to frame his conception of a Deity with the heart of a mother, a God of compassion, tenderness, and love. Her untiring love produced a mightier harvest than she dreamed. Like many another devoted soul, she builded better than she knew. She unconsciously sowed seed which had its fruition in the thought of Jesus. Mary in Nazareth would have marvelled had it been suggested that her affection would be eulogised centuries after, an affection that did not perish at the darkest hour.

Poets oft have sung her story,
Painters decked her brow with glory,
Priests her name have deified.

But no worship, song, or glory,
Touches like that simple story—
Mary stood the cross beside.

And yet it is recorded that man has prayed, "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe! Who hast not made me a woman."

THE APPEAL OF THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—I wonder whether all your readers know what is meant by the Fund. As your own columns and the postman's letter-bag bear witness there are many funds, large and small, craving for help. But there is one, which alike by its object, its scale, and the backing it has received, stands apart from all the others, and claims special consideration from all who are interested in our religious future.

The appeal for £50,000 on behalf of the Sustentation Fund, made at the instance of the National Conference, but cordially supported also by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, by the Stipend Augmentation and Sustentation Funds, and by various Provincial Assemblies and District Associations, has so far been wonderfully successful. Indeed, there is just a danger that its very success may prove a snare. I seem to notice lately a tendency to think that because about £38,000 have been obtained quietly and fairly quickly, the remaining thousands still needed will in some mysterious way come together of themselves! But things do not happen in that way. All along we have been warned by wise friends that the last quarter of our task would be the most laborious.

While rejoicing in what has been thus far accomplished, I do wish at this stage to appeal most earnestly to the great body of our people to take their share in an enterprise which has met with a generosity without precedent among us. Each of our congregations in England and Wales (the area that is to benefit by the Fund) has been requested to appoint persons to canvass its own members.

Many of them have not yet replied, but it is hoped they will do so without further delay. Some say that they have just made, or are making, or are about to make efforts for other objects. A few—very few, I am glad to say—plead these preoccupations as a reason for declining our appeal. In one sense it is gratifying, of course, to learn that there is so much activity among us, and I have not a word to say against any of the forms which it takes. I would only venture to point out that, under present conditions, of all means for strengthening our churches, the efficiency and status of the ministry are by far the most important. And how are these to be maintained, unless an adequate, or rather a less inadequate, and, what is of equal importance, a less precarious, provision is made?

It is impossible to speak too warmly of the kindness with which, generally, the appeal has been met. I personally know of one case in which the purchase of a motor has been deferred in order that a much larger donation might be given than would otherwise have been possible. I have been told of another in which a new house was being planned, and the scheme has been laid aside for a time, for a similar reason. It is good to hear of examples like these of a faith that proves itself by works. Many others have made sacrifices that they might give on a much larger scale than they could give to any annual expenditure. Let the same spirit touch the hearts of all our people, and there can be no doubt of the result.

May I put the matter in a concrete way? If congregations comply with the request that has been made, about six hundred canvassers will presently be at work. If each canvasser in his or her congregation secures the promise of on an average £18, for the payment of which five years may be taken, the matter is settled. Some of course, cannot be expected to obtain so much. But then, others will get a good deal more, so that, on the whole, with a united and determined effort, I believe this figure is not too high. In recent years I have had special opportunities of becoming acquainted with many of these congregations, having preached at one time or another for about 200 out of 300. Our people may not be demonstrative, but they can do big things when their mind is set that way. By way of illustration, I recall a case known to me, in which out of an income of certainly less than £400 (most of it earned), with the claims of a growing family to meet, one of our members contributed £60—spread over three years—to one special object. To a spirit like that all things are possible. Does it still live among us? If it does, we shall soon hear that this thing not only can be done, but shall be done.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES HARWOOD.

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

SIR,—In answer to the parts of Dr. Lionel Tayler's letter that deal with mine, it is unnecessary to take your space in explaining my purposely short and concentrated letter. I have had sufficient evidence elsewhere that its meaning was clear to the ordinary reader. With his penultimate paragraph I cordially agree, and reciprocate its kindly tone. No discourtesy was implied in the reminders of some of the limitations that beset anyone, woman or man, who discourses on the nature of woman. Perhaps men are not so likely to realise these limitations as are women themselves, who, with freedom and opportunity being slowly measured out to their sex, are conscious of continuous surprises of development in their own natures, and still less are able to reckon up the natures of other women, and of the girls growing to women around them. One does not wish to damp "sincere inquirers," but human lives are here concerned, and it would be a serious matter if generalisations inevitably doubtful were crystallised into dogma, or were given a practical application.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A NEW INTERPRETATION OF ST. PAUL.

St. Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History. By Adolph Deissmann. Translated by Lionel E. M. Strachan, M.A. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.

PROFESSOR DEISSMANN'S fresh and delightful study of St. Paul is now accessible to English readers in an excellent translation. The work owes its charm not only to Deissmann's extensive knowledge of the papyri, which have thrown such an interesting light upon the language and the habits of the lower middle classes in the early centuries, and to his acquaintance with the principal localities of the Apostle's labours, acquired through his personal experiences in two journeys, but to his sympathy with Paul's genius, and the insight thereby obtained into the thoughts, feelings, and activity of this wonderful, many-sided man.

From Paul's style and vocabulary Deissmann draws an important conclusion in regard to his social and literary rank. He says, "It appears to me certain that Paul of Tarsus, although his native town was a seat of high Greek culture, did not come from the literary upper class, but from the artisan non-literary classes, and that he remained with them." In agreement with this view is a point on which he insists as of the highest importance, that Paul's writings are in the strictest sense letters, that is, that they were not written for publication and with a literary end in view, but were a spontaneous outpouring of his mind and heart, called forth by special occasions, and addressed to a limited circle of readers, or, as in the case of Philemon, to an individual. He distinguishes by the term "letter" this kind of composition from the public and literary "epistle," which was well known in learned society. He believes that through a clear recognition of their real character the difficulties which have led to assertions of spuriousness disappear; and he consequently accepts all the letters as genuine, with the doubtful exception of those to Timothy and Titus, in regard to which he is still undecided.

His treatment of "the world of St. Paul" is full of illuminating suggestion.

For instance, he saw an old weaver "at Tarsus near 'St. Paul's Gate' weaving a coarse material on his wretchedly primitive loom," and this conveyed "at least some notion of what a weaver's workshop looked like in ancient times." We may imagine Paul going to such a weaver to buy cloth for making tents. Another experience may be quoted: "The neighbourhood of Miletus one evening in April, 1906, when we had lost our way and were riding after sunset through the swamps of the Mæander, and next day when we were at Didyma in the house of a Greek who had just been shot dead by robbers, afforded us a drastic commentary on the 'perils of rivers, perils of robbers,' 2 Cor. xi. 26."

A few quotations must suffice to suggest Deissmann's "estimate of the man from the point of view of social and religious history." He says: "Even St. Paul is considered by many to-day to be darksome as well as great. The darkness, however, is largely due to the bad lamps in our studies, and the modern condemnations of the Apostle as an obscurantist who corrupted the simple gospel of the Nazarene with harsh and difficult dogmas, are the dregs of doctrinaire study of St. Paul, mostly in the tired brains of gifted amateurs." Consequently, "That really and properly is the task of the modern student of St. Paul: to come back from the paper St. Paul of our Western libraries, Germanised, dogmatised, modernised, to the historic St. Paul; to penetrate through the 'Paulinism' of our New Testament theologies to the St. Paul of ancient reality." With a touch of humour he remarks, "I am afraid the people of Iconium, Thessalonica, Corinth would all have been overtaken by the fate of Eutychus of Troas if they had been obliged to listen to the Christological, hamartiological, and eschatological paragraphs of modern 'Paulinism.'" Again he speaks of "The earlier students of Paulinism, with their onesided zeal for presenting the 'doctrine' of St. Paul in orderly paragraphs like so many anatomical preparations, lifeless and undated." All this is most refreshing to anyone who has long looked upon "Paulinism" as a sad travesty of the great Apostle. In this book he no longer comes before us as the stalwart orator, the keen logician, the mighty dogmatist who unfolded the riches or corrupted the simplicity of Christ's gospel, but as a man of mystic and prophetic soul, one who "is essentially a hero of piety first and foremost." He "is spiritually the Great Power of the apostolic age." But Deissmann does not make him a second founder of Christianity. He says, "From the broadest historical point of view Jesus appears as the One, and St. Paul as first after the One, or—in more Pauline phraseology—as first in the One." "Jesus stands out in history linking heaven and earth together, but stands in lonely majesty and might." "What St. Paul is, he is in Christ." This admiring and sympathetic sketch of St. Paul's personality is worked out in successive chapters on St. Paul the man, the Jew, the Christian, the Apostle, and St. Paul in the world's religious history, on which due regard for space does not allow us to dwell; but I hope sufficient has been said to attract our readers to this valuable and interesting volume.

But I must not conclude this notice without referring to an Appendix, which contains a useful discussion of the date of Gallio's Proconsulship, as disclosed by a fragmentary inscription discovered at Delphi. Deissmann concludes that "Gallio entered on his office approximately in the middle of the summer of 51," and that St. Paul came to Corinth early in the year 50, and left late in the summer of 51. We thus obtain a more certain clue to the determination of Pauline chronology than was formerly available. The text of the fragments, which were found many years ago, is exhibited in facsimile, and submitted to a careful examination. I am not quite satisfied that the usual interpretation of the passage in Acts xviii. is correct; but this is too technical a subject for discussion here; and in any case a different explanation of it would not fix the date of St. Paul's visit more than about a year later than the time assigned to it by Deissmann.

A POET OF IMMANENCE.

Immanence: A Book of Verse. By Evelyn Underhill. London: J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd. 4s. 6d. net.

To those who are of the company of the mystics "the world as the imagination sees it is the durable world"—or, perhaps, we should say "the world as the intuitive spirit sees it." That is the secret of their tranquillity, of the childlike and almost irresponsible joyousness which belongs to them alone. They have found their heart's rest in "the secret splendour of Reality," and henceforth the earth and its manifold loveliness are but the symbols of an imperishable beauty which transcends all phenomena. Miss Underhill's verses are, as we should naturally expect, full of this consciousness of the eternal amidst the flux of time; and yet it would be difficult to name another writer at the present day who is more sensitive to the warmth and fragrance of the visible world. The flutter of wings, the rustle of leaves,

The scudding cloud, the cleanly-running brook,
The humble, kindly turf, the tossing bough,

all are inexpressibly dear to her, and it is in terms of earthly love, passionate and tender, that she addresses the Bridegroom of her soul. God is, for her, as she expresses it in the exquisite poem, "Immanence," with which the book opens, the Lord who sets His Feet

Amidst the delicate and bladed wheat . . .
I come in the little things . . .

Yea! on the glancing wings
Of eager birds, the softly pattering feet
Of furred and gentle beasts, I come to meet
Your hard and wayward heart.

And at the end of the volume she leaves us with the thought of our age-long wandering

Back to our Father's heart, where now we are at home.

She is a lover of humanity, and revels in the mental picture of St. Catherine of Genoa treading the narrow alleys

Between the blind, the ailing, and the lame
Steadfast in ministry.

As the vision came to St. Paul on the road to Damascus, so it comes to her, less blindingly but just as surely, on the road that leads out of London "to seek the cleanly wild," where the divine Drover of the soul leads home his weary flock after the toilsome day is done. And here we find the key-note of much of the best modern poetry—the compassion for all who sin and suffer without which the foundations of human brotherhood can never be truly laid. The still sad music of sorrow is heard amid the quiring of Cherubim and Seraphim, and the gentle spirit communing with celestial hosts is drawn downward by pity and love to the inferno of the broken-hearted, if haply it may give its life to save the children of men. The little poem to "The Lady Poverty," simple, almost austere in its phrasing, is charged with the kind of emotion which is seeking an outlet more and more in individual acts of service for mankind.

I met her on the Umbrian hills,
Her hair unbound, her feet unshod:
As one whom secret glory fills
She walked—alone with God.

I met her in the city street:
Oh, changed was her aspect then!
With heavy eyes and weary feet
She walked alone, with men.

These poems are, indeed, nearly all characterised by the accent of pity no less than by the tender humility springing from a devotional spirit which every line betrays. They are full of the restrained optimism which sees in all earthly trials but the necessary schooling for the soul, in the tossing human wreckage on the tides of abandonment and dissolution

Death's delight, which is Light, God-given.

Chosen by Arthur Quiller-Couch.
Oxford: At the Clarendon Press.
6s. net.

SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH has again laid us under a heavy debt of gratitude by giving us as the fruit of many months spent in the study of modern English poetry the "Oxford Book of Victorian Verse." Somehow the word "Victorian" sounds a little out of place, for this cargo of lyrics seems too splendid and myriad-coloured, too fragrant with "sandalwood, cedarwood, and sweet white wine" to belong to an era which has a reputation for tedious commonplace and the drab virtues of an unenlightened and too-prosperous middle class. But perhaps it may dawn on some who turn the pages of this book that nothing, after all, could be more foolish than the supercilious way in which we speak of the nineteenth century while we are reaping its golden harvests and giving lip-homage, at least, to its intellectual giants. Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch is not troubled with this "flippancy of fashion," and has the honesty to declare that he rises with reverence and wonder from the study of the mass of poetry, some of it so supremely excellent and worthy to endure, written with ardour "in these less-than-a-hundred years." To dip into such a volume, sitting, for choice, by a ruddy fire while the wintry wind howls boisterously without, is to draw near once more to the ivory gate which only opens for the lovers of beauty with hearts at leisure from themselves. How many dreams of bygone days are recalled, what hours of exaltation and delight when we, too, panted for the immortal garland as we read with flushed cheeks "The Scholar Gipsy," "Annabel Lee," "The Hymn to Proserpine," or "Wordsworth's Grave"—when we thrilled to the challenge of Henley's "Invictus," or the splendid gravity of "The Hymn to Colour," which, by the way, is not included in this volume. Perhaps it would ill become us to complain that there are many omissions from these generous pages which we should have preferred not to detect. After all, it is largely a matter of individual taste what is put into an anthology and what is left out, and few people would choose alike if they were asked to select the "hundred best poems" (an odious task!) to say nothing of seven hundred and seventy-nine! But we cannot understand why Stephen Phillips is only represented by a trifling lyric of two verses, or why Edward Carpenter is left out altogether in a collection which has been enriched by many beautiful poems (not strictly Victorian) from such singers as Alfred Noyes, W. H. Davies, Ezra Pound, Walter de la Mare, Hilaire Belloc, T. Sturge Moore, and Lascelles Abercrombie. We are glad to see that the late Richard Middleton has not been overlooked, and that the lovely lines "On a Dead Child" find place in a volume so full of precious things.

MR. HENRY FROWDE has enriched the cheap series of Oxford poets by the addition of "The Poems of Samuel Taylor Coleridge" edited with textual and bibliographical notes by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. It will be a great boon to all students of poetry of small means to have a great deal of the material of Mr. Ernest Coleridge's exhaustive edition at such a modest price. Few if any volumes of similar size are of equal value for the study and criticism of poetry upon its textual side. It takes us into the poet's laboratory, and enables us to watch one of the great magicians of words as he selects and prunes and engages in the endless tasks of self-criticism; while for those who prefer the simple joys of the imagination without these subtleties, there is the poetry itself, great enough even in its less inspired moments to lend light and flame to many pedestrian rhymers. Will Mr. Frowde now give us Donne in a similar form? (London: Oxford University Press, 1s. 6d. net and 2s. net.)

art of the meditative essay finely flavoured with the love of nature and religion, always perhaps a little in the minor key. Her other books, "The Grey Brethren" and "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius," have never attracted quite so much attention. Messrs. Duckworth have just issued a new uniform edition in three volumes which should help to knit bonds of friendship between Michael Fairless and many new readers. (Three vols. in a case, 7s. 6d. net.)

CHRISTMAS BERRIES.

THE word "Christmas" brings to our minds visions of plum pudding with a sprig of holly stuck in it, mince pies, parties, Christmas Trees, Santa Claus, mistletoe and many other pleasant things. Christmas would scarcely be like Christmas, for instance, without a bough of mistletoe hanging on the gas bracket in the hall, so that we could greet each other with a loving kiss as we came in.

What a glorious time we have in decorating our homes with holly and laurel, and how excited we are every Christmas Eve when we hang up our stockings to receive the gifts of goodwill from Santa Claus. Though I am now a grown-up, I always hang up my sock, and am disappointed if I find nothing in it. I also decorate my study every year, and have had really fine times when I have gone out into the woods to gather the holly and mistletoe for this purpose.

I wonder how many of you know anything about these two beautiful plants, and why the berries come each year. I will try and tell you all about them.

I have had quite a number of long walks recently into the country, and I have been surprised to find the hedgerows covered with thousands of red berries—"hips and haws" you call them—and the holly bushes are not behind in the number of their berries. You have noticed these berries also, and have no doubt asked yourselves why there are so many.

There is an old saying that when the berries are numerous a hard winter is to follow, and the berries are food for the birds. This saying may or may not be true, but what is really right is, that when the setting time of the berries came round there were no frosts, and the flowers were able to do their work in attracting the bees—their lovers—and the bees in their turn brought the life-giving yellow powder to the flowers which gave birth to the berries of the autumn.

If there are few berries, it means that when the plants were in bloom frosts came along and killed many of the flowers, and as each flower produces at its base a berry, only those flowers which were left alive were able to do what was required of them.

But there is another surprise for us, for if we inquired very carefully into the matter we should find that the berries depend upon the birds, and if there were no birds there would be no berries. It seems strange, but we must try and find out why.

The berries of the plant will be the children, and the plants must find some scheme for sending their children out into the best places in the world, so that they also may grow up and have children.

The birds and the animals drive their young out in a way which seems very hard-hearted, but the plants cannot do this. They never know what it is to have the joys of parents, but even before their children are born they have to part with them, and it comes about in this way.

Inside the tiny red berry is a little seed, and this seed, if planted, will grow into a child plant, and later into a full-grown plant, but while it stops on the branches of its parent plant it cannot become anything at all.

Plants have many methods to enable their seeds to become children; some, like the sycamore, grow a wing on each side of the seed, and when the wind blows it carries the winged seed away to a different part, spinning in the air as it travels; others enclose their seeds in pods, and shoot them out broadcast like the violet; while others are carried away by squirrels and other little animals, and though they eat many of them up, they get tired and sleepy in the winter, and forget all about many of the seeds they have carried away, and these grow into plants.

Other plants do their best to attract the birds and other carriers, and if you were to watch the berries growing you would find that they were first green, then yellow, and in the autumn they become that beautiful red which we all know. As soon as the birds see the red colour, they pluck the berries and eat them, but the little hard stone in the middle passes right through their bodies and falls into the ground, where it sets, and the next spring becomes a tiny plant, bearing, when full grown its own crop of berries.

So you see that the birds are the means of producing fresh crops of berries for themselves the next autumn.

The mistletoe is quite different from other plants as it depends entirely on the birds for its life. It does not grow in the ground, but is always found to be growing locked in the embrace of some large strong tree.

The berries are a dainty delicacy for the bird, and he eats his fill, swallowing every part of them. The seeds pass right through his body, and as the fluid runs down the branch of the tree the rough bark stops its progress, and the tiny seed finds root on the underside of the bough, and were it not for the birds we should soon be unable to gather this time-honoured little bough of mistletoe.

You may have wondered why winter berries are mostly red. If a man or a firm has anything to sell, they advertise it, and you have seen many bright posters on the hoardings in your district. The red berries are the advertisement posters of the plants, telling the birds that they may come and eat their fill, and take away as many as they like; and the birds, once tasting, like the delicacies so much that they come again and again, bringing their friends with them, and in so doing they carry out exactly what the plants wish them to do.

This Christmas as you sing your songs of "goodwill and peace," and decorate your houses and churches with the beautiful holly and mistletoe, you will remember that you could not have done so had it not been for your tiny feathered friends the birds. So I want you to be kind to them, and not throw any more stones, or set ugly traps to catch them.

JESUS ENTHRONED.

Jesus in the skies,
My little eyes
Cannot see thee;
But thou art there
In sunny air,
Round me freely.

Jesus in my home,
Ever to me come
In thy sweet love,
And make me kind,
With happy mind,
As tender dove.

Jesus, in my breast
Wilt thou rest?
Have there thy throne?
For gold and wood
Have joy and good,
And love for stone?

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

MODERNISM—ROMAN AND ANGLICAN.

LINDSEY HALL LECTURE BY CANON LILLEY.

THE second of the course of Lindsey Hall Lectures was delivered at Lindsey Hall (Essex Church), Notting Hill Gate, on Thursday, December 12. In the unavoidable absence of the Rev. F. K. Freeston, the lecturer, Canon A. L. Lilley, was briefly introduced by the Rev. H. E. B. Speight.

Canon Lilley, in his treatment of the subject of "Modernism—Roman and Anglican," made it his main purpose to give an account of those ideas whose working in the religious sphere has produced the movement called Modernism, to discuss some criticisms to which they have been very generally subjected, and to consider the general religious situation in Western Europe as furthering or retarding their growth.

MODERNISM AND THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES.

After defining Modernists as those who aim at accommodating traditional Catholic theology to our present knowledge of science and history and to the ways of thinking by which that knowledge has been shaped, the lecturer pointed out a distinction upon which certain prominent Modernists have insisted, namely, that between their own kind of Liberalism and the Liberalism of the Protestant (especially the German Protestant) churches. He indicated the motive for this. It is not found in their attitude towards theology; both distinguish theology sharply from revelation, the effort of the intellect to form a thought-system out of the data of revelation from those data themselves, and both combat the tendency of traditional theology to identify itself with revelation and to claim for itself the immediate validity which belongs to revelation alone. It is found rather in their views of the scope of revelation. While the orthodox Protestant, regarding the Bible as the exclusive source of Divine Revelation, rejects everything which cannot be brought into accord with Scripture, the Modernist believes that the experience of the saints of Christendom and of its men of exceptional religious insight, inspired and shaped by the original revelation, constitutes a real growth of that revelation, and that the theology which corresponds to this fuller content of revelation demands to be included in every attempt at theological transformation. The Modernist insists on the value of the Catholic conception of revelation as given not only in Scripture but in the general tradition of Christian life, but he insists on this solely in the interests of the principle that revealed truth can grow into still greater fulness. Important as it is to recognise this distinction, the suspicion of Liberal Protestantism to which it has given rise has been confined to a few only of the leading Modernists, notably Loisy and Tyrrell. Most of the other leaders seem to regard Protestant Liberals as close allies doing the same work as themselves in another field and under different circumstances.

FREEDOM AND AUTHORITY.

The root-problem of religion, the lecturer continued, is precisely the reconciliation of freedom and the institutional element in religion which involves authority. In religion no less than in other departments of human activity it is true that if authority does not conduce to freedom it fails of its true purpose and hardens into a paralysing despotism, whilst if, on the other hand, freedom is not able to establish within its own sphere a centre of authority, it is likely to end in a self-defeating anarchy. The Modernists recognise the need of concentrating upon a solution of this problem, if Christianity is to retain a vigorous hold on the modern world. Their solution is, briefly, that in every aspect of the religious life there is a Divine and a human element, the former given in conditions of perfect freedom—"the Spirit bloweth where it listeth"—the latter acting as the provisional mediating agency, using authority for its purposes. The principle of authority is formed within and exists for the purposes of the sphere of the Divine Spirit's free action.

REVELATION AND THEOLOGY.

Canon Lilley went on to show how this Modernist solution is applied to Revelation, to the Church, and to the Sacraments. Revelation is the free movement of the Divine Spirit in certain souls; these are impelled by that same movement to communicate to or evoke in others their God-given certainty. To this end they need symbols by which to convey their experience to others, but these symbols already constitute an elementary theology which mediates the revelation; in the course of its diffusion, as a result of its contact with other kinds of knowledge, it becomes in self-defence an elaborate theological system. As such it ultimately claims an absolute validity equal to that which we ascribe to the revelation of which it is the medium, but since other forms of human knowledge are enlarging, its claim defeats the very purpose it was meant to serve, for it has been forgotten that it arose as an accommodation of experienced revelation to the thought-systems of the past. When this stage is reached, one of two things must happen. The advent of new knowledge in other spheres reveals the insufficiency to the general mind of this theological system claiming equal validity with the original revelation, and the revelation itself is condemned along with its theological mediation; or else a new spirit of revelation is poured out and forces the theological system to perish that it may live again in a more serviceable form. The Divine element, revelation, is closely connected with the human element, theology, which shapes the data of revelation as a system of knowledge. Revelation depends for its communication and diffusion upon a living and flexible theology, while theology itself depends for its vitality and flexibility upon at least a frequent renewal of the vivid experience of religion in the soul of man.

THE NEED OF A VISIBLE SOCIETY.

In a similar way the Modernist solution of the problem may be applied to the Church. The invisible communion of holy souls in the Christ-spirit, to be real, must manifest itself in a visible society. As the visible society extends in space and time it loses something of its identity with the invisible Church, but continues to claim identity, the result being that conformity to its compromising temper takes the place of conformity to the Divine will, and outward communion with itself takes the place of real communion with the Divine Spirit. The Modernist regards the visible Church, within whose borders the true Kingdom of God ought to lie but beyond which it may and does actually extend, as an instrument of the invisible Church. And, again, the same distinction of the Divine element and the human appears when we consider the spiritual life and the sacramental aids traditionally ministering to that life. The sacraments are the normal means which have appeared in history within the Christian society for establishing and deepening faith-contact with the Divine. Without them the Christian life would lose much of its power of concentration on the need of communion with the Divine. But it is possible to conceive, as in the case of the Quakers, of a quite exceptional faith which is independent of them. In any case their value is a value for faith and by faith.

THE PROSPECTS OF MODERNISM.

Canon Lilley devoted the concluding portion of his lecture to the discussion of the prospects which such a movement as Modernism has of successfully permeating and transforming the existing Churches, and especially the Church of Rome. At present, he thought, there is on all hands a determined concentration. The more powerful the Churches are in this the more success or show of success they have with the common populations who still cling in any sense or degree to religion. Only in a religious society which can present a bold front to the modern world can those find assurance who feel that religion is menaced. Even personal religion, where it exists, is beginning to be affected by the mood of the time; it is taking refuge in fear and a distrust of every contemporary movement. The political mood of the moment is expressed either in imperialism or in materialistic socialism. In all this individuality and the need for it are depressed. Expert efficiency and specialised talent are being substituted for the ideal of the development of the whole man. The effect of this on religion is apparent. Churches which have relied most on their organisation have gained confidence. In place of training men as children of God for the life of the larger world in which they would have to prove their sonship; these Churches are engaged in issuing collective edicts and manifestoes on every question of the day; their congregations are often more or less excited mass meetings rather than individuals face to face with the judgment of God. In this the Church of Rome has found an opportunity of displaying her natural genius for authority and government. The Vatican decrees appeared to be the extreme logical development of her authoritative methods. Only a few weeks ago Pius X., one of the least self-exalting of all the Pontiffs of Rome, delivered an allocution in which he laid it down that love of the Pope is one of the most essential means of personal salvation, and that such love means an attitude of spirit which will express itself in the desire to obey every mandate issued from the supreme authority. That temper gives the Roman Church enormous strength in the face of a hostile world, but it holds out little hope of success to Modernism. But all depends on the spiritual resources which Modernism controls, on the depth and permanence of the genuine religious feeling it can generate. The demolishing of what is decayed in ancient religious systems will be accomplished independently. Its own business is to renew religion. Just as Modernism is forcing authority into a mood of relentless hostility, so persecution is trying and purifying the temper of Modernism. It is pledged to work within the Roman system, but it is in close spiritual contact with every movement in the outer world towards a larger and fuller light, and when the present materialistic view of society has passed away it may be found to be the one spiritual force which has been sufficiently tried and disciplined to lead us all into a fuller possession of the spiritual heritage of Christendom.

MEMORIAL TO THE REV. S. FARRINGTON. UNVEILING AT RICHMOND CHURCH.

ON Saturday afternoon last, a large congregation assembled in the Richmond Free Church to witness the unveiling of the memorials to the late Rev. Silas Farrington. After the singing of a hymn, the Rev. H. Gow read the 23rd Psalm and other passages from the Bible, and offered up a prayer. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant gave the following address:—

"The months have rolled away since a similar company met under the shadow of mourning for him whose outward memorials we dedicate to-day. It is now nearly a year since he passed from us, and while we cannot but feel anew the solemn touch of that event, I trust that we are all able to accept it with unburdened hearts. Our duty on this occasion is to establish a public and abiding record of the grateful affection that gathers round the name of Silas Farrington. It is most appropriate to a memory so sweet and healthful that we should heartily say, 'The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord.' Here where everything around is a monument of his faith, hope, and love: where his ripe years fulfilled according to the measure that was granted a noble vision of service to God and man, we recall his face and figure, his look and voice, his many acts of graceful kindness, his wise and varied teaching, his love of things lovely and of good report, his courage and devotion. Through such lives, as it appears to me, there shines more of the meaning of the Life Supreme than we can ever catch in the forms of the intellect. In them some accent of the Eternal Word takes flesh and dwells among us; well for us if—at least where mere closeness no longer obscures our sight—we begin to see more clearly and fully what the being of our beloved was, and for ever is, to us.

"Our friend's service to us, as a friend, leaves our own lives permanently enriched; and to that extent each of us is made a memorial of him. But mindful of our infirmities, and desiring that those who are to come shall not be left ignorant altogether of his worth to us and them, we make sacramental these fabrics, where thought and skill have transmuted the earthly elements into forms of beauty, and from this day onward we bid them serve as a means of grace to all who shall look upon them. As often as men and women, wistful and perhaps a little weary of it all, come into their presence, may they be encouraged, not in vain, to lift their eyes to the heights whence help comes. May fruitful deepening of reflection still follow these reminders not only that one by one the fathers are taken away, and that 'gathered to the fathers must all children be,' but that things as transient as human life may accomplish much. Upon the fate of fading petals rests the harvest of every orchard, and the passing hours serve the garnerers of eternity. Here in the church which he did so much to create may successive minds for many generations wrestling for truth find so much of it that each in his place may live a true and faithful life, triumphant over doubt and fear and all mean things. So lived he. And may little children, whose blue eyes shall stray to the forms and colours of these windows or spell out the tablet on the wall, in God's good time grow to delight as he did in sunshine and the Love that gives it, and in the human love that makes sunshine everywhere. So shall his memory mingle with that deep pure stream of holy influence that flows from the past to 'make glad the city of God.'"

After the address, Mrs. G. H. Edwards and Miss Roscoe unveiled the memorials. The tablet consists of a border of Connemara marble, with lettering standing out from a background of alabaster, and is placed on the N.E. wall of the church. The inscription, read aloud by Mr. G. H. Edwards, is as follows:—

"In affectionate remembrance of the life and work of the Rev. Silas Farrington, First Minister of this Church (1889 to 1904) which was built largely through his efforts. He completed here 50 years of service in America and England, as Minister of the Word, and died December 19, 1911, in his 82nd year, at Cannes, France, where he rests in the hope of the Life Eternal.

The lore of Christ and his apostles twelve
He taught, but first he followed it himself."

The five stained glass windows in the apse were next unveiled. The central figure represents the Sower, on either hand are figures representing Faith and Hope, and Charity and Liberty. After unveiling the windows, Mrs. Edwards spoke of the ready response which friends from far and near had given to the appeal for help in raising these memorials, and she hoped that for many years to come the memorials would be a reminder of the beautiful life associated with them.

Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, as secretary of the church and one of its trustees, thanked Mrs. Edwards and Miss Roscoe for so kindly unveiling the memorials, and on behalf of the church thanked the donors for their gifts, and assured them that the church authorities would accept the custody of them and would with reverent care treasure and guard them.

Extracts from several letters received from those who were unable to come were read, and the service closed with a hymn and the benediction, pronounced by Dr. Foat.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

BIRMINGHAM STUDIES IN SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

THE SOCIAL POLICY OF BISMARCK.

WE have received the first two numbers of a new series of social studies, the outcome of investigations made by students working under the direction of the Social Study Committee of Birmingham University, to which reference has more than once been made in these pages. Miss Ashley gives us an extraordinarily interesting study of the social policy of Bismarck, which is not only good history, but good sociology. The evolution of Bismarck's thought from "Junker"ism to the kind of State Socialism in which he afterwards came to believe is carefully traced. Immediately after he came into office he began to show his interest in social problems, which, to some extent, at least, was stimulated by what he saw of the English Co-operative movement in 1862. As early as 1863 he demanded an examination of the labour question, although Itzenplitz, the Minister of Commerce of the time, thought there was no question to discuss! Bismarck laboured hard for this minister's conversion, with whom in the year of the founding of the empire he started a long correspondence on social questions. Itzenplitz must have been a man of some individuality as he accumulated 17 letters from the man of "blood and iron," before replying!

The most valuable and certainly not the least interesting portion of a really useful study is that dealing with German insurance legislation, which is compared with the recently introduced English system. On the whole it may be said, as Miss Ashley points out, that Germany has not repented of its experiment nor of the general policy of which it is a particular instance.

ENVIRONMENT AND EFFICIENCY.

The other study "Environment and Efficiency," by Miss May Thomson, comes opportunely at a time when the eugenists, or at least some of them, are inclined to lay too much stress on the importance of heredity, to the exclusion of environment. Miss Thomson's purpose has been "to show by a collection of definite results the overwhelming part played by environment in the building-up of human efficiency. She has investigated the records of certain industrial schools and emigration homes, with those of 20 children boarded out by the Glasgow Parish Council, with a view to discovering what becomes of those children who have been removed from a less to a more favourable environment. It ought to be noted that the cases are not "selected," but simply set down as they came, starting from a given date. The results are most striking. Out of 265 cases 192 were satisfactory, 44 were doubtful, and 29 were unsatisfactory. Of these 29, however, it should be noted that 8 were definitely mental cases, and five almost deficient. Miss Thomson has, therefore, easily disposed of a pseudo-scientist writing in the Mendel Journal for 1909, who delivered himself of the preposterous statement that "the stunted individuals are not the product of a one-roomed tenement, but the one-roomed tenement is the expression of the inherent incapacity of this race to be able to do anything better for itself; it is the natural outcome of their already existing physical, moral, or intellectual degeneration." One does not wish ill to people capable of such a sentiment as this, but the present writer perpetually finds himself wishing that this Mendelian and various other superior persons who wish to "improve" the poor had to live for six months, from October to April, in a third-floor back on a pound a week, which they had to earn as the poor have to earn it. Such an experience would not only soften their hearts, but clear their heads of an infinite amount of untenable social dogmas. The social studies referred to are published by Messrs. Longmans, price, 2s. net each.

THE Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh, of Dundee, has been appointed to succeed the Rev. Charles Voysey as pastor of the Theistic Church, Swallow-street, Piccadilly. Dr. Walsh, who was ordained to the Baptist ministry, formerly held charges at Pitlochry and Newcastle-on-Tyne. Later on he accepted the invitation to the Gilfillan Memorial Church, Dundee, and a year ago formed the Free Religious Movement which was carried on at Kinnaird Hall. His ministry in Swallow-street will begin on January 12.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Astley.—On Saturday, December 14, a sale of work was opened by Mrs. William Eckersley, of Lime House, Lowton. Mr. T. Smith, of Peel Hall, Astley, presided, and as a Churchman expressed his great appreciation of the work which is being done for the moral and religious life of the village in connection with the Unitarian chapel. The chairman was supported on the platform by the Rev. P. Holt, Mr. Wm. Eckersley, Mr. Thomas Hamer, J.P., Mr. G. Holden, Mr. John Lee, and Mr. John Holland, J.P. Letters of regret for absence were read from the Vicar, the Rev. J. J. Wright, and the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern. There was a large attendance, and the sales and donations amount to over £60.

Billingshurst.—The series of week-evening lectures in connection with the Free Christian Church was continued last Tuesday, the 17th inst., when the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of London, delivered a lecture on "New Zealand and the Maoris." Of the Maoris he spoke very favourably. They were capable, he said, of the highest intellectual and moral development, as had been proved by many living examples, and by their general peaceful and industrious conduct. There was a good attendance, and a hearty vote of thanks was passed at the close of the lecture.

Blackpool.—The Temperance Hall, Bispham, has recently been purchased by Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, J.P., and offered to the Bispham

Urban District Council for use as a public hall or institute by the inhabitants. This generous gift has been accepted, and it is believed that it will prove a real boon to the neighbourhood. Mr. Grundy has in addition presented a number of books for the library which has recently been established. It is expressly stated that no intoxicants shall be supplied or consumed on the premises, but that the hall may be used without any restrictions on account of political or theological or other opinions or beliefs or partisanship.

Blackpool.—A sale of work was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Free Church on Wednesday, December 11, in aid of the church funds. The opening ceremony on the first day was performed by Councillor W. Roberts, of Morecambe, the minister, the Rev. J. Horace Short, presiding. On Thursday the sale was opened by Miss Bleazard, of Blackpool, and Miss Maxwell presided. The amount realised was £46 8s.

Brighton.—On December 11 a presentation of books and bookcase was made to Miss Mellor and Mr. H. W. Aldrich in view of their forthcoming marriage, on behalf of the Sunday school of Christ Church. Miss Boys, in making the presentation, referred to Miss Mellor's ten years of faithful work in the school, and Mr. Dallaway (superintendent) and the minister, the Rev. Priestley Prime, added expressions of congratulation and goodwill. A musical programme which had been arranged by Miss Burgess followed.

Bury St. Edmunds.—The 201st anniversary of the Churchgate-street Chapel was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, December 15 and 16, congratulations being received from ministers in the neighbourhood. A concert was held on Monday. The Rev. Geo. Ward, the minister-in-charge, presided in the absence of the Rev. Arthur Golland.

Chester.—A sale of work took place in the schoolroom adjoining Matthew Henry's Chapel on Wednesday, the 11th inst. Mr. W. Orrett presided at the opening ceremony, which was performed by Mr. F. H. Illingworth, one of the chapel trustees. Owing to the success of this effort the remaining debt has been cleared.

Ilford.—A sale of work, &c., was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Church, on Saturday, December 14. The opening ceremony was performed by Miss Holland, the Rev. A. H. Biggs presiding. Mr. E. R. Fyson, chairman of the congregation, in moving a vote of thanks to Miss Holland, stated that all the departments of their church were in a healthy state. During the day the church orchestra, conducted by Mr. H. D. Holdom, contributed a varied programme of music, and at the close of the sale a concert was given. The object of the sale of work was to raise £25 to balance up the finances of the year. The net proceeds reached £30.

Lewes.—The annual sale of work in aid of the funds of Westgate Chapel was held at the Phoenix Institute on Tuesday, December 10. Alderman Ebery presided at the opening, which was performed by the Mayoress of Lewes (Miss Stott). The Rev. J. M. Connell offered a welcome to all present, and cordial speeches were made by the Rev. B. Wilkinson (Congregational), the Rev. S. J. Cowdy (Congregational), the Rev. Granville Ramage (Presbyterian), and the Rev. T. E. Bridgen (Wesleyan). A musical programme was given in the evening, and the sale was very successful.

Mansfield.—The second of the series of meetings for the session was held in the Schoolroom of the Old Meeting House on Wednesday evening, December 11, when a lecture on "The House of Wisdom" with limelight illustrations, showing Simon Memmi's frescoes in the Chapter House of the Dominican Church of St. Mary in Florence, was given by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, of Leicester. There was a good attendance, and the lecture was much appreciated.

Southend: Resignation.—The resignation of the Rev. Thomas Elliot, minister of the Unitarian Church, which will take effect in September, 1913, has been accepted with sincere regret by the Church Committee.

Stratford.—Owing to the success of a social gathering held last week, to which several old scholars were invited, it has been decided by the West Ham-lane Unitarian Sunday-school teachers and elder scholars to form an old scholars' society. The temporary hon. secretary, Mr. A. Philpot would be glad to hear from any old scholar, whether at home or abroad, who is desirous of joining the society. The school has now over 100 scholars with some thirty teachers, while an adult class recently started is attracting an average attendance of 25 young men and women.

Torquay.—We regret that a serious inaccuracy relating to the financial position of Unity Church appeared in the account which we published last week of the opening of the church. Mr. Henry Lupton writes as follows: "The facts are that we have raised by promises £3,120 (subsequently increased to £3,190), and that over 99 per cent. has been paid up. The buildings have been opened absolutely free from debt, and we expect to have a balance of £200 to £300 towards the small endowment fund of £500 which we hoped to raise. We know that we have the hearty congratulations of our friends throughout the country, and we shall be still further indebted to them if they will assist us with the £200 to £300 which we still want to complete our scheme."

Wakefield.—On Sunday, December 8, the anniversary sermons were preached at the Unitarian Chapel, the pulpit being occupied in the morning by the minister, the Rev. W. T. Davies, and in the evening by the Rev. H. R. Taverner, who also conducted a children's service in the afternoon. The annual soirée took place in the school on Monday, the Rev. W. T. Davies presiding. The Rev. D. D. Waters and Mr. Fred Clayton, of Leeds, addressed the gathering.

Warwick.—On Wednesday, December 11, a recognition service was held in the High-street chapel to welcome the new pastor, the Rev. Gardner Preston. Sir M. H. Lakin, Bart., presided, supported by the Rev. Gardner Preston, the Rev. B. Hannah (Baptist), the Revs. C. H. Dodd, J. Gibson, F. Moore (Congregational), the Rev. A. M. Holden, former pastor of the chapel, and the hon. secretary, Mr. E. Hill. Apologies for absence were read from Dr. Estlin Carpenter, Dr. Jacks and others. The chairman expressed the thanks of the congregation to the secretary for his services in arranging for supplies during the last three and a half years. He himself was connected with the church by family traditions, and it was nearly a hundred years since his grandfather worshipped in it. The Revs. B. Hannah, C. H. Dodd, J. Gibson, and F. Moore also spoke. The Rev. G. Preston replied in suitable terms, and later in the evening presided over a social gathering at which the Mayor and Mayoress of Warwick (Councillor and Mrs. Lloyd Evans) were present.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CHRISTMAS CAROL.

In his book on "Christmas in Ritual and Tradition," which was reviewed in our columns last week, Mr. C. A. Miles gives some interesting and curious facts relating to the origin of the Christmas Carol. "A carol, in the modern English sense," he says, "may perhaps be defined as a religious song, less formal and solemn than the ordinary Church hymn—an expression of popular and often naïve devotional feeling—a thing intended to be sung outside rather than within church walls. There still linger about the word some echoes of its original meaning, for ‘carol’ had at first a secular or even pagan significance. In twelfth-century France it was used to describe the amorous song-dance which hailed the coming of spring; in Italian it means a ring- or song-dance; while by English writers from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century it was used chiefly of singing joined with dancing, and had no necessary connection with religion.”

* * *

“Whether Christmas carols were ever danced to in England is doubtful; many of the old airs and words have, however, a glee and playfulness, as of human nature following its natural instincts of joy, even in the celebration of the most sacred mysteries. It is probable that some of the carols are religious parodies of love songs, written for the melodies of the originals, and many seem by their structure to be indirectly derived from the choral dances of farm folk, a notable feature being their burden or refrain—a survival of the common outcry of the dancers as they leaped around.”

THE “ADESTE FIDELES.”

In an interesting chapter dealing with the French Noëls and Latin Hymnody of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Mr. Miles alludes to the sweet and solemn “Adeste Fideles,” which apparently comes from a date near 1700, and “by its music and its rhythm, perhaps, rather than by its actual words has become the best beloved of Christmas hymns. The present writer,” he continues, “has heard it sung with equal reverence and heartiness in English, German, French, and Italian churches, and no other hymn seems so full of the spirit of Christmas devotion—wonder, awe, and tenderness, and the sense of reconciliation between Heaven and earth. Composed probably in France, ‘Adeste, fideles,’ came to be used in English as well as French Roman Catholic churches during the eighteenth century. In 1797 it was sung at the chapel of the Portuguese Embassy in London; hence, no doubt, its once common name of ‘Portuguese Hymn.’ It was first used in an Anglican church in 1841, when the Tractarian Oakley translated it for his congregation at Margaret-street Chapel.”

THE FEAST OF THE NATIVITY.

The English people’s love of Christmas has survived many attempts to destroy it. “These poor, simple creatures are made after superstitious festivals, after unholy holidays,” said a speaker in the House of Commons in the seventeenth century. Mr. Miles tells us how the Puritans when they had gained the upper hand proceeded to the suppression not only of abuses, but of the festival itself. “An excellent opportunity for turning the feast into a fast—as the early Church had done, it will be remembered, with the Kalends festival—came in 1644. In that year, Christmas Day happened to fall upon the last Wednesday of the month, a day appointed by the Lords and Commons for a Fast and Humiliation. In its zeal against carnal pleasures, Parliament published the following ‘Ordinance for the better observation of the Feast of the Nativity of Christ:—

‘Whereas some doubts have been raised whether the next Fast shall be celebrated, because it falleth on the day which, heretofore, was usually called the Feast of the Nativity of our Saviour; the lords and commons do order and ordain that public notice be given, that the Fast appointed to be kept on the last Wednesday in every month, ought to be observed until it be otherwise ordered by both houses; and that this day particularly is to be kept with the more solemn humiliation because it may call to remembrance our sins and the sins of our forefathers, who have turned this Feast, pretending the memory of Christ, into an extreme forgetfulness of him, by giving liberty to carnal and sensual delights; being contrary to the life which Christ himself led here upon earth, and to the spiritual life of Christ in our souls; for the sanctifying and saving whereof Christ was pleased both to take a human life, and to lay it down again.’”

A STORY OF THE TWELVE NIGHTS.

A quaint Tyrolese story is told in Mr. Miles’ book on Christmas which owes its origin to the notion, common throughout the Teutonic world, that a supernatural being, who has various names, is supposed to go her rounds and punish the girls who leave their flax unspun during the Twelve Nights, i.e., the period between Christmas Eve and the Epiphany. “At midnight on Epiphany Eve a peasant—not too sober—suddenly heard behind him ‘a sound of many voices, which came on nearer and nearer, and then the Bercht, in her white clothing, her broken ploughshare in her hand, and all her train of little people, swept clattering and chattering close past him. The least was the last, and it wore a long shirt which got in the way of its little bare feet, and kept tripping it up. The peasant had sense enough left to feel compassion, so he took his garter off and bound it for a girdle round the infant, and then set it again on its way. When the Bercht saw what he had done she turned back and thanked him, and told him that in return for his compassion his children should never come to want.’”

Mr. and Mrs. Massingham are arranging for a reunion of members of the Food Reform Summer School and others at Benares House, 17, Norfolk - terrace, Brighton, during the Christmas and New Year’s holiday season. There will be lectures, musical entertainments, &c., in the lecture hall which adjoins Benares House on similar lines to those given in August and September last, the first being by the Rev. Priestley Prime on “The Origin of Life.” The second lecture will be on “Buddhism,” and the third, by a Jew, on “The Talmud and the Rabbis.” Inclusive terms for full board residence from 35s. Either food reform or ordinary diet is provided.

New School Buildings Fund.*

THE Committee and Congregation are appealing for funds to provide new and enlarged accommodation for the Schools and Institutions of the Church.

The School is one of the largest among our London Churches, has over 200 scholars on the books, and has quite outgrown the rooms. The buildings are over 100 years old and inconveniently planned. The Scheme for new buildings and enlargement provides :—

- (1) New Class Rooms.
- (2) Rooms for a Boys' Club.
- (3) A Church Hall.
- (4) Better accommodation for the Chapel-keeper.

Contributions should be sent to, and will be gratefully acknowledged by the Treasurer,

Mr. J. S. HARDING,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE proprietors of the daily newspapers are to be congratulated upon their unanimity in suspending publication upon Christmas Day. The public interest and the spirit of goodwill have triumphed over the forces of competition; and last Wednesday the immense and highly organised machinery for the distribution of newspapers came to a standstill. Anyone who will pause to consider the speed with which work of this kind has to be done, and the incessant demands of the public, demands which in recent years have made immense inroads upon Sunday, will appreciate the greatness of the boon. The pioneers in this movement; like the Manchester Guardian, which has not appeared on Christmas Day for 50 years, are deserving of all honour as public benefactors.

* * *

THE figures of the census of church attendances taken recently in Liverpool, are quite devoid of comfort for any form of Christian faith, Catholic or Protestant, Anglican or Nonconformist, Orthodox or Heretic. They have given rise to a good deal of comment, but there is nothing sensational or startling about them. They only condense into a more precise form the impressions which careful observers have formed for themselves. It is one of the cases where it is much easier to diagnose causes than to prescribe remedies. The causes may be divided into two classes, intellectual and social, and of these the social are in many ways the more significant. We are only just beginning to bring the spiritual imagination to bear upon the break-up of traditional habits in our great city populations, divorced from ancestral memories, dazzled by the possibilities of wealth, and eager for bright pleasures which can be enjoyed without effort.

* * *

THERE is a tendency among some people, who regard religion simply as one of the competing interests of life, to urge the adoption of what are called modern methods in order to cure the growing slackness in church attendance. Shorter services, striking and bizarre subjects for sermons, temporary alliances with socialism or some other dominating interest of the moment, free and easy methods in which the stately ritual of the past is replaced by discussion, have all had their advocates, and in the hands of clever men won some temporary success. But there is far less confidence in ingenious novelties of this kind than was the case even a few years ago. Quietly and steadily we are coming back to the only possible point of view, that an easy and pleasant kind of religion has little in it that men should desire it. It is always true that man's extremity is God's opportunity and a temporary divorce from the comfort and power of religion may be one of the hidden ways of divine preparation for a fresh outpouring of the Spirit.

* * *

THERE is a sense of mingled loss and gain, of hope and regret, in some words by Dr. Monro Gibson, which appeared recently in the Daily News and Leader, in connection with the close of his long ministry at St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church. "One thing I deplore," he said, "is an unquestioned falling-off in the reading of the Bible. In the old days people would read the Bible regularly, a chapter a day, right through. I am afraid there is comparatively little of even that faulty method to-day. The Bible is crowded out by novels and newspapers and magazines—though, of course, when it is really studied it is studied much more intelligently than it used to be. Family prayers, too, have become far less of an institution than they once were. Young people, when they set up house, don't set up family prayers, as their fathers did. No doubt the rush of modern life has a good deal to do with it, but it is a symptom one sees with sorrow."

* * *

ON the subject of the new attitude towards traditional statements of truth Dr. Gibson spoke as follows :—

"We go to the Bible for a vision of the human soul in its aspiration Godward—its aspiration towards God and its inspiration from God. Now, you cannot represent this by dogmas. We have got away from that. You must express it in terms of human life, in pictures of actual human experience. The new message is not God in a Book, but God in the men that wrote the Book; not God in a dogma, but God in human experience. A man must have something in him to respond to the Divine, he must have aspirations, but those aspirations often have to be awakened into life. In the old days the motive of fear would awaken them. To-day you must accomplish it by showing the effect of aspiration, of a longing for higher and better things as it has worked in actual human experience."

* * *

IN resolving to discontinue the use of the Athanasian Creed in their Cathedral the Dean and Chapter of Hereford have given an official sanction to a practice which has been adopted quietly and without episcopal protest by many of the clergy. Even in Westminster Abbey the creed is sung as an anthem without what are known as the "damnable clauses." It was unlikely, however, that the public action of a Cathedral Chapter would be allowed to pass without protest. The forces of orthodoxy have been marshalled in defence of the Catholic Faith, and the Church Times has fulminated with threadbare anathemas against latitudinarians. On the other hand there has been some liberal criticism from the point of view of legality and of the obligations which rest upon the clergy, however burdensome and antiquated they may be, until relief is granted by Act of Parliament. But we think that this is pushing abstract arguments of consistency beyond the limits of wisdom and common-sense. As a living society the Church of England must adapt itself to its surroundings and grow into new habits of mind; and legal reform is only possible when a clear case has been made out for it in the convincing language of conduct and daily habit. The reformer makes his demand in the most telling way he can. He may be beaten by official interference or the inertia of the public, but he trusts to the forces of life and the better mind of the Church to justify him when he has the courage to translate the thoughts of many hearts into action.

THE death of the Rev. S. A. Tipple has called forth some fine and simple tributes to the value of his ministry, so fragrant in the memories it has left behind it of quiet dignity and singleness of heart. It is well for us to be reminded that celebrity does not necessarily imply greatness of soul, or an obscure place poverty in spiritual gifts. Many of the qualities which lead to quick success in the pulpit and the ephemeral fame of the platform and the press have little to do with the insight of experience or the deeper loyalties of the Christian character. Popularity is a hard mistress, and the desire of it often makes the heart incapable of loving God. Many workers in the quiet corners of the vineyard will be encouraged as they read the uneventful record of Mr. Tipple's ministry, and probably he himself would have craved for no richer reward.

* * *

THERE was a meeting, delightful in its simplicity and friendliness, in the parish room of St. Mary's, Paddington, on Monday evening to say farewell to Canon Lilley. Dr. Clifford was there as a friend and neighbour, and various other people who have turned to the quaint little church on Paddington Green as a spiritual Mecca in the wilderness of London; but it was composed chiefly of the men and women of the very poor parish, among whom Canon Lilley has lived for many years. Loud applause greeted Dr. Clifford's suggestion that means must be found to bring him back to London. If those who control these things recognise the need of the hour, they will not allow the official preference for average clerical types to place its chilling veto upon his return. Preachers who are fertile in easy forms of compromise, and men who run with zest in the leading strings of their denomination, are fairly plentiful in the pulpits of all the churches; but what we need, and too rarely get, is men of wide and sensitive sympathies, who live close enough to the heart of Christianity to re-interpret it to the modern mind.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE ETERNAL LIFE MANIFESTED.

A Sermon for Christmas Day.

By JAMES DRUMMOND, D.D.

"That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, and our hands handle¹, concerning the word of life; and the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and declare unto you the life, the eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us)" —1 John i. 1, 2.

THE little Epistle from which these words are taken is one of the most profound, and at the same time one of the most artless compositions in the New Testament. His thoughts drop from the writer sometimes without any very obvious connection, and it is not easy to analyse them so as to exhibit the articulation of the several parts. But while it makes little appeal to the logical understanding, it goes down to the depths of religious experience, announces the most transcendent ideals in the simplest language, and makes the most searching appeals to the conscience and the heart. For this reason it is one of the most precious of devotional books, one to be taken into the secret chamber, and used as a test of our sincerity and uprightness. In reading it we breathe an upper air, pure as on mountain solitudes, and we enter into communion with one of the chosen spirits of our race, and through him into that high and holy fellowship of which he speaks with such unassuming confidence. Its most characteristic teaching may serve to guide our meditations on this Christmas Day.

The work is always spoken of as an epistle, and it is obviously written to certain persons who are well known to the writer, and who are supposed to know him so intimately that it is needless to tell them who he is. Neither at the beginning nor at the end does it resemble a letter; for there is no name either of the sender or of the recipients, so that we are indebted to tradition for our knowledge of the author. We are assured that in the early Church it was uniformly ascribed to the venerable Apostle John, who, after the ruin of Palestine by the arms of Rome, retired to Ephesus, where he died in extreme old age, the last survivor of Christ's selected band of twelve. Notwithstanding this unanimity of early belief, the ascription of the Epistle to John has been pronounced erroneous by many scholars of modern times. This variety of opinion opens a large question which we cannot at present discuss. I will only say for myself that I think John's authorship has been disputed on insufficient grounds. But in any case the spiritual value of these few pages remains almost, if not wholly, unimpaired. The writer speaks with a quiet authority, which sits so naturally upon him that it requires no parade. He is full of affection towards those whom he addresses. They are his "beloved," his "brothers," his "little children." He is a man of vivid religious experiences, who has looked into the abyss of sin, with its darkness and death, and scaled the heights of holiness where the Father reigns in eternal and unclouded light. And he felt in himself that it was through Jesus Christ that the supernal life had come to him, and filled his heart with love. This leads us to the thought with which the Epistle opens, and which we may regard as its dominant theme.

It is clear that the fundamental fact in the writer's experience was that he had undergone a momentous spiritual change. Looking back upon this change, he describes it in the strongest language:—"We have passed out of death into life."

Yet we have no reason to suppose that he was ever what is called a bad man, or had been negligent of the ordinary observance of religion. It is probable that in all outward things he had conformed to the moral standard of his day. But such conformity is quite compatible with a secret selfishness of heart, with low standards of judgment, and with a prevailing worldliness of motive. He had come to see that this lower life, if life it could be called, with all its seeming fairness and earthly satisfactions, was drawn from beneath, and had no permanence, and that, if a man would truly live, he must be born from above, and become partaker of the universal and eternal Spirit. This higher life had taken possession of him. A new ideal had commanded his reverent admiration, new motives had stirred within him, the transient glories of an earthly existence had lost their charm, old temptations had dropped away and ceased to trouble him, and the pangs of wounded self-love had given place to an ineffable peace. He had learned at last what it was to live. Now this consciousness of a blessed life within, with its visions and revelations, and its subduing spell upon worldly and selfish passion, is the primary fact in all Christian experience. Whatever interpretation we may give to it, it cannot in itself be denied or explained away. The moment when first we love, when first we gaze upon the human form with a reverent awe, and honour the unseen son of God, hidden in the most degraded, when first we look upon the world and its pursuits, not from the unstable centre of our own selfish cravings, but from the unchangeable centre of truth and justice, that moment is as vivid as a flash of lightning in the dark, and bears a Divine message to the soul. The burden of that message is that this is the life eternal, the life which alone abides amid the decay of nations and the crash of empires, and possessing itself in peace can smile in the face of death. This is "the witness within," the foundation of an assured faith, the impregnable rock, which rests not on the shifting sands of argument and speculation, but on the solid basis of man's profoundest consciousness.

To the aged Apostle, as he looked back on the departed years, another fact was equally clear and certain: this life had not come to him as a spontaneous growth, but had been revealed to him in Jesus Christ. He had walked with him by the shores of the Galilean Lake, and hung upon his words, and loved him, with perhaps too fiery and untrained a zeal, while that Life Beautiful was still visible upon earth. But ever since his beloved Teacher had drooped his head upon the cross the Spirit had been speaking to his longing heart; and it may be that he was an old man before he knew in its completeness that birth from above, whereby he found himself in a kingdom of God, and in fellowship with the Father and the Son. How often is it good for us that those whom we have loved as religious leaders should be taken from us; for then all that was transient and earthly in them passes from our view, or is glorified in our grateful memory, and we come to see the ideal and essential man, and the Divine secret of his life. So in the memory of the Apostle that life which had not been recognised in all its grandeur and power while it was still present, became more and more distinct as it stood out in bold contrast to the lower life which he saw all around him, the one luminous spot in a world which seemed to be lying in wickedness. He now beheld new depths of spiritual meaning as he recalled the expression of that face, and felt a new throb of exalted feeling as he remembered the warm pressure of that hand. Yes, the life had been revealed to sight and touch, and had passed into the disciple's heart. That life was love; but how describe it, that plant which had its roots in God, and spread abroad its branches for the healing of the nations? To him, who had been an ardent, vindictive, and ambitious youth, it stood forth as a soul-subduing power, summing up in itself all Divine excellence, and making worldly passions and self-seeking appear to be the worthless things they are. He had loved his teacher as a friend loves his friend, and had, no doubt, felt the soothing influence of the higher love resting upon him; but the cross revealed it in its hidden greatness and heavenly purity. "He laid down his life for us": was it as the disciple stood beside the cross that the scales fell from his eyes, and all the meaning of self-sacrificing love shone upon his opened vision, or did it gradually become more and more evident, and disclose all its vast consequences, as the years went slowly by, bringing their new experiences of cruel opposition and heart-rending sorrow? We cannot tell; but we may be sure that that Spirit which bloweth where it listeth breathed upon his soul its regenerating air, and gave him Divine visions, and inspired the words which still speak to our hearts to-day.

Now, if the interior life is the immovable foundation of religious faith in its widest sense, this second experience is the basis of distinctively Christian faith. It is true that we have not seen and handled, and it is only in imagination that we can walk with Christ in Galilee, and listen to his pleading voice by the lake-side or on the mountain, or pray with him in Gethsemane, or weep beside his cross. Nevertheless, it may be good for us too that he has gone away, and that only the great impression of a life in God is left, so that we may not be unintelligently bound by an authority without, but, conscious of his Spirit within, may be freely shaped by it according to our varying dispositions and abilities. Those who saw and handled have delivered their message to the world, and still that message appeals to our hearts, and the Christ-life enters in, and makes all things new. We too have seen with the eyes of the spirit, and have found that this is the way of peace, and leads to the highest communion which is known to man.

The message reaches us along two lines of transmission.

So far as we can learn, Christianity was spread abroad for many years simply by oral teaching. It was the living voice of kindled faith, the persuasive influence of changed and sanctified lives, the tender services of compassion, and the spirit of brotherhood pervading the scattered societies of disciples, that wrought for Christianity its early triumphs. The life, though it had become broken and partial, was still manifest in human form, and presented to the eyes of men a new ideal working as a restoring power in the midst of a corrupt society, and transforming many a humble home into a temple of God. It was thus that the Christian Church was formed, fusing together through the power of one Spirit men of various nations, and wakening amid diverse languages echoes of the one eternal voice which, throughout the world, speaks to every listening heart. And so, without any Scriptures, the life might have come down, with ever increasing volume, to our own day. And indeed it has come down; and though sometimes the dreams of Apostles and martyrs may seem to have perished amid the dread realities of a brutal and degraded Christendom, the life is still here, and still its most powerful organs are lives surrendered to the call of God, and lips touched with holy fire. Still we behold it in the unselfish ardour of dedicated youth, and the serene glory of hallowed age, in the simple and loving service of ministering hands, and in the patient trust that meets affliction with undaunted front. Sometimes it comes, in response to earnest pleading, like a rushing mighty wind to hearts that seem little prepared, sometimes with calm and silent growth amid the sweet blessedness of a Christian home. In the former case there may be a keener consciousness of its power and its source, but in both alike it is the life that was manifested of old, and has been transmitted through successive generations with immortal power.

But while all this is true, we cannot dispense with the Gospels and the other writings of the New Testament, which convey to us the portraiture of Christ's life, the characteristic outlines of his teaching, and the impression which he made upon his earliest disciples. Too often his image has become distorted or blurred when it has been delivered too exclusively to traditional thought or imagination; and it is necessary to go back to the original sources, and recover, as far as we can, the genuine historical facts, and the real character of that spiritual consecration from which the whole Christian movement started. To do this has been one of the most distinctive endeavours of theology in the last century. The Gospels have been brought under the most minute examination, and sometimes the results have seemed merely negative and destructive. But negative criticism has prepared the way for more constructive work; and while it is no longer possible for those who allow their opinions to be swayed by evidence to deny the presence of mistaken views, and even of legendary tales in the Gospels, the result of the whole inquiry has been, at least in my own opinion, to place Christianity on a far more spiritual basis, and to bring us closer to the great formative ideas which have been the purest sources of its power. The leading aim of the freer theology, especially in recent years, has been to come nearer to the religious consciousness of Christ himself, to interpret his inmost feeling, and to trace the relations of his Spirit to the varying needs and conditions of men. And when we take a large view of the Gospels, and do not lose ourselves in mere critical detail, we surely obtain a wonderful impression of a spirit of life, which was swayed by one dominant ideal; which comes as a revealing light to those who sit in darkness, and nevertheless have some faculty of spiritual vision; and which, if we are discerning and simple of heart, commands our deepest veneration and love. Of this beauteous image, when once it has visited our minds, no criticism can deprive us; indeed judicious and reverent criticism will only set it forth in clearer light and purer colour. We now know the meaning of a Divine Humanity, and perceive what it is to be a child of God. We have seen the life, we have heard the voice of the Spirit, and have handled, at least in mystic dreams, the mighty bond of fellowship which links heaven and earth, and is at last to unite the brotherhood of man in one household of God.

Such, then, are the facts that fall within our immediate experience, the consciousness of a higher life within us, claiming our reverence and submission, and the connection of this life historically with Jesus of Nazareth. These facts, calling as they do for some interpretation, are the starting points of Christian theology. The Apostle gives them an interpretation which is not less profound because it finds its immediate response rather in the religious emotions than in the speculative intellect; and in consequence suggests itself so readily that I have inevitably blended it with the description of the Apostle's experience. This life has its eternal source in God, and therefore brings man into vital union with the Father in heaven.

When this thought becomes clear in our minds, we begin to see a Divine life pervading creation. Even what we have regarded as great dead masses of matter are seen to be thrilling with energy, and shaping themselves, under the guidance of rational law, into an ordered universe. Nature is unveiled, and wherever we turn our eyes we see some thought of God, some reasoned form, impressed upon the living tissue of the world. From the majestic sweep of stars and the splendour of the immeasurable heavens down to the flower that we spurn as a weed and the glow-worm's tiny lamp we see enshrined a thought which appeals to our thought, and, if we are listening, we may hear a word of life speaking to our hearts. The living creatures in whom this life is most manifest rise in an ascending scale, till they culminate in man, in whom alone, so far as we can judge, there is the consciousness of a dual life, a life which, though given, has become his own, to use for such ends as he will, and another life which, though in him, is not his own, but claims his allegiance, and lights the way to a nobler future. This better life is too often stifled by sin; but the lower life of self which has been perversely chosen fades away, and the records of individuals and of nations which have perished in their sins have proved that this is not the eternal life. There are few, if any, who are not in their secret hearts aware of this, who are not at least dimly conscious of something better than they have attained; but many do not know that it is the Divine life which is thus seeking them, and the Divine word which thus brings light to them and to every man. Most men require some appeal from without to waken this consciousness. We are made dependent on one another, and the abounding life of one enriches the poverty of another. And so when the fulness of time was come and the Spirit of Divine Sonship took complete possession of one man, he became the revealer of the life of sonship, and, wakening the dormant consciousness of man's filial relation to God, he quickened men with the energy of his own life, and became the first-born among many sons of God. This highest life of the spirit must bring with it the highest thought of God. As we climb through the scale of being we receive grander and deeper revelations; and that which forms the supreme life of man is the highest which we can know of the life of God. The essence of that supreme life, according to the Apostle, is love. With him, as with Paul, love is the greatest of spiritual gifts. This was the new force which, through Christ, had wrought its way into his soul, taming his fiery heart, conquering his worldly ambitions, and making him ready to lay down his life for the brethren. If such was man's highest, then God was love; for man could not be higher than God, and this blessed life, with its holy consciousness of a Divine peace and a Divine leading, could come only from him who is the infinite Source of life and light. And so it is the eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested to us. May it rise with new power in our hearts this Christmas day, and abide with us for ever.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE TRUTH AND FALLACY OF A COMING WORLD RELIGION.

III.

THERE must be something natural and indigenous in expectations of the second advent of Christ. All through history the hope has burst intermittently into flame. Though the gospel itself warned men against cries of "Lo, here is the Christ," and commanded us that if it were said, "Behold, he is in the wilderness," or "he is in the inner chambers," we should not be perturbed—though Jesus said, "Behold, I have told you beforehand"—yet the warning has not been effective. Wild and fantastic ideas have again and again taken fire in the fevered brains of visionaries who have prophesied the end of the world and the second coming. Mad men and religious maniacs have set up to be themselves Christs and Messiahs re-incarnated again in this world, and have seldom failed, when lunatic enough, to secure a brief notoriety and enthusiastic following. Such insanities have always come to nought, and Humanity has gone steadily forward living on its great memories and trusts and its unfailing, never-ceasing inspirations.

In some respects these fanatical forecasts deserve our sympathy. They are indeed indigenous to our nature in so far that hope springs eternal in the human breast. They are a recoil from the dull and spiritless routine of the present and a revolt from the dead and cramping traditions of the past. Souls full of impatient fury clamour for the miraculous interference of God. They feel that the past is an extinct and exhausted heritage; that the present is equally powerless, without living faith or kindling imagination, and, at heart, infidel and godless. So they turn to the future and, the wish being ever father to the thought, they announce the coming of Christ, the birth of a new Messiah, the appearance of the Great Teacher and Saviour who will once more lift us out of darkness into light, out of discord into harmony and the Great Peace.

But this throwing forward of all the splendour and all the inspiration into the future is as one-sided and superficial in its own way as a blind and exclusive reliance on the past. There is no necessary magic about the future that we should be emboldened to draw blank cheques upon its credit; there is no necessary curse about the past that we should distrust its solvency. The future may be worse than the past, not better. It will certainly not be better than the past if it be going to ignore the past. It will be better than the past only as a scholar may transcend the master, by first learning what he has to teach. And this means the very unusual and unpopular attitude of humility and teachableness.

An artist friend of mine was telling me with a certain amount of humorous zest how he went to an exhibition of pictures in London a year or two ago—an exhibition planned on the novel and enterprising undertaking that every subscriber should be guaranteed that his picture, whatever its merits or demerits, should at any rate be exhibited, and thus given its chance to be seen and appreciated by a reluctant and unworthy public. The result according to the racy account of my friend was the maddest pandemonium of eccentricities that the mind of man could imagine. It seemed as if most of the exhibitors had outwitted each other in the effort after an insane riot of licence. There was, with few exceptions, neither beauty of idea, of line, of composition, of colour, nor any skill of technique. It was in the main a welter of perversity and egoism where the ordinary "futurist" would appear coldly and austere classical.

It seemed to me as I heard my friend delightedly describe his impressions that the exhibition was a pictorial parable of what happens to all creative effort when it is divorced from the steady control of past achievement. Such fanaticism in Art, like much fanaticism in religion, arises in part from egotistic contempt for what the great Master-Souls have done after infinite labour and pains. This eccentricity is worse than mere affectation or pose, worse than mere subjectivity: it is the immoral pride whereby Lucifer fell and angels were damned; a wicked and loathsome vanity too conceited to admit the worth and beauty of what greater spirits have already done. It is the impudent imposture of small men insulting the genius, the latchet of whose shoe they are not worthy to unloose. There are great men in the present. Mr. Bernard Shaw would probably say that he is one of them. There will be great men in the future. Our rising undergraduates are nearly all convinced that they will belong to that company. But one certain characteristic of the really great man is his reverent readiness to admit his indebtedness to those who have gone before. The true genius will sit meekly at the feet of the masters, and will not lightly turn away from them as from sources from which he has nothing to learn.

It is thus in religion. The more deeply religious we are the more ready are we to acknowledge our indebtedness to the example and inspiration of great heroes and saints, who wrought and worshipped long ago. Jesus himself thus quoted the prophets. There is no future for any Faith which does not nourish itself on the past, and so absorb the past as to perpetuate it.

The idea of progress and of evolution is certainly a valuable and inspiring idea; but we must take some care not to misinterpret it. In a former article I wrote of a true and a false idea of universalism. There is also a true and a false idea of Progress. We hear quite intelligent people speak sometimes as if Progress or Evolution were one steady, even ascent from lower to higher, a development from good to better, from big to bigger, an unbroken, uniform, uninterrupted improvement. But the truth is that there are reactions and ebb-tides of the spirit. There is no sure guarantee that greater geniuses will appear in the future than in the past. Doubtless, with the spread of civilisation, the general level of material and physical efficiency will improve. Quick-firing guns, motor cars, aeroplanes, and super-Dreadnoughts may multiply, but it does not follow that any single mind will eclipse the greatest mind of the past. Mechanical invention has very little to do with spiritual growth. It may therefore be that the greatest musical genius has already appeared and may never be surpassed; just as it may be that the greatest flood or the greatest hurricane has already taken place, and that nothing bigger will ever take place in the future. It is the sheerest nonsense to suppose that there is something in evolution which will necessarily produce a taller giant, a fatter baby, or a more monstrous monstrosity than has already appeared. For all we know the hottest day, or the longest drought, or the severest frost in England has already occurred. In other words, evolution does not guarantee an indefinite breaking of records. A man may run the hundred yards in eight seconds or in six, but we are perfectly sure that the man will not be born who will run it in half a second. Yet if Evolution were a perpetual breaking of records there would be no limit to the speed, and the athlete would at last appear who would jump to the goal like a shot from a rifle. But we do not believe that. We believe in limits, though we cannot define the limits.

Let us apply this to Art. Most people believe in great classical epochs that stand out as furnishing a norm and a standard for all time. Such a classical epoch we have in the greatest era of Greek sculpture. We know more about human anatomy; we have better mechanical tools, more precise appliances for measuring and cutting; we have learnt a few more tricks and dodges for the studio, but in actual beauty of idea and form, in passionate and intellectual inspiration, have we eclipsed the best that Greece has produced? We need not dogmatise about possibilities, yet are we forbidden to say positively that if we ever are going to surpass Greek sculpture it will be because the very spirit of it has worked in us as an awakening stimulus, a vivid thrilling force reproducing itself at a higher level? That is to say, sculptors will ever in the future draw inspiration from the past, and can only excel and surpass by virtue of the past. Again, I doubt very much whether moral and religious prophecy will ever again transcend the spiritual passion of some parts of the Old Testament. Some of the Psalms, parts of Isaiah and Jeremiah, seem to have touched the very limit of devotional utterance, so that Christianity itself incorporates them as its own life. Perhaps Elizabethan literature gives us the high water mark of the literary genius of the English people.

These somewhat random examples, however challenged, will serve as illustrations of what I mean when I say that the idea of Progress or Evolution does not at all guarantee an ascent without limit to human genius. That seems to me the crudest of crude popular superstitions. What Progress may do is to raise the general level up to the level of the best spirit in the past, to inspire the multitudinous democracy with the passion of the best genius in the past, until we all attain into the measure of the stature of his fulness. It does not offer the vain flattery of telling us that Mr. Lloyd George is a greater statesman than Gladstone or Mr. Bonar Law than Burke—because our modern statesmen come later in time; or that because we live a considerable number of years after Milton or Beethoven, we must therefore produce a finer poet or composer than these—still less that the particular egotist who is arguing thus is himself that finer poet or musician. Whatever else it is, Progress is at least the appropriation of the moral wealth of the past and a development sustained by the resources of the past, and a distribution of its treasures and joys in widest commonalty spread.

People imagine that because Jesus of Nazareth lived nearly 2,000 years ago, therefore some greater spiritual genius than he must shortly appear, some higher Revealer of God. I do not deny the bare possibility because I believe "all things are possible to God." But though I do not deny the possibility, I do not believe it will actually come to pass; nor will it affect me until it does come to pass. It is a dead not a live hypothesis. My vital belief is that the practical limit of true Sonship towards God and true Brotherhood towards Men was reached in Jesus of Nazareth, and as a single spiritual personality he is not going to be supplanted. By virtue of his religious eminence he is a "classic"; and it is hardly an abuse of philosophical terminology to say that he is an "absolute" classic. At any rate it will be time enough to talk of surpassing Jesus when his superior has been produced and when we have lived with some nearer approach to his spirit. At present we are all pathetically remote from the height of his holiness, from the purity of his devotion, from the depth of his love, from the consecrated heroism of his life, from the self-sacrifice of his agony and cross, and from the absolute surrender of his spirit into the hands of God. For us to talk of Jesus being surpassed is like a commonplace and mediocre sculptor talking of surpassing the works of Phidias or Praxiteles; or like a Vigo-street minor poet claiming to be greater than Æschylus. To speak in this sense of a coming World-Teacher and excite our brains about him, is to turn away from the living example and kindling inspiration which is really ours and feed on windy speculations. It is to become religious post-impressionists without historic norm or standard or classical instance. Even to encourage dreams about a coming World-Teacher is a species of ingratitude and infidelity to Jesus Christ. It is as much as to say that we are disappointed with our Lord, that he is not quite good enough for us, that we are tired of him and seek another to come. What God has actually given us in real history is not sufficient, not worthy of our progressive and advanced civilisation. We turn from God's most glorious gift to the race of men and ask Him for something better and fresher. Is that how we propose to utter our Christmas thanks to God? Is that how we are going to show our love to Christ? Is that how we are going to prepare the way and make ourselves meet for his coming into our hearts? If any World-Teacher should appear I am quite sure that his first lesson would be to teach us to be modest and teachable enough to accept the inspiration and follow the example of the Christ we now have, not to spurn him as inadequate to the world's need. The fact of Jesus is still the mightiest, the most stupendous fact in all human history. It more than matches our utmost endeavour. We shall never gauge all its deep meaning. It goes deeper than our deepest woe, higher than our highest joy. When we try to fathom his significance we only hear the plunging of our little plummet in the deep sea. The coming World-Teacher is Jesus himself. It we cannot love Jesus with a deathless loyalty we shall not love anyone else any better. If we hear not Jesus and the saints, neither shall we be persuaded though he rose from the dead or came again from heaven in visible glory.

No, no; our need is not a new Christ, but a new loyalty, a more sincere obedience, a more passionate love to the Christ we have. Here is scope for all the Romance and all the Idealism of which we are capable. A thousand thousand years will not exhaust the Progress that is to be found in fidelity to him. No Time can arrest the spiritual evolution that springs from his holy heart. Lo, he is with us alway, even to the end of the world. Behold, he stands at the door and knocks. Glory to God in the highest and on earth Peace among men, in whom he is well-pleased!

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Two hundred and fifty years ago John Biddle, the "Father of Unitarianism" in England, died practically a martyr's death, as it was the result of his many imprisonments for his faith and his principles. There had been Unitarians before him in England, some of whom had suffered at the stake for their beliefs. But, like Elijah and Elisha, they left no literary legacy to the generations who came after them, whereas Biddle did. He published the results of his studies, and did all he could to circulate them. This is why he counted for so much in the religious life of England, and still counts, just as it is the "literary" prophets of Israel that counted amongst them. He felt that he had a mission, that it was his duty to spread the truth as he knew it, and that he would be faithless to his God if he did not. Biddle was also the first to gather together a congregation for the purposes of worshipping the Father only, and of searching the Scriptures. His first biographer says that their views spread so much, "so propagated, that the ministers at London were exceedingly offended at it." We know little or nothing concerning the members of this first Unitarian congregation, with the exception of Thomas Firmin, the philanthropist, who earned for himself the titles of "Father of the Poor," "The Almoner of England," and "the happiest person in the world." It is believed that some of the other members were authors of several of the "Socinian Tracts," brought out in Biddle's lifetime, which are now so rare, whose latest edition was issued between 1691 and 1695, and are contained in three volumes. After Biddle's death we hear nothing further of the society he founded. Although we do not hear of Unitarian societies for nearly a hundred years after his death, still Unitarianism had come to stay, for now it had a literature; and although some of the tracts were burnt by the common hangman, they could not be suppressed. They had an enormous influence among members of all denominations, especially the Anabaptists. Influential members of Cromwell's army were also infected with this "heresy," the Independent section in particular. The Presbyterians were Biddle's evil angels throughout his life, being his bitterest persecutors to the day of his death, in 1662.

Biddle arrived at his new religious views by reading and searching the Scriptures, and he published them at first not so much with the object of propagating them, but with the hope that they might be refuted by some one abler than himself. He had no particular desire to be a heretic—to be different from other people. No one ventured to refute his arguments for a fairly long time; and when they did they did not appear to satisfy Biddle, but helped to confirm him in his own conclusions.

Biddle was born at the village of Wotton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, in the year 1615. His father, Edward Biddle, was a yeoman, who also dealt in woollen clothes. His son, John, was educated at the Free School at Wotton, where he soon gained distinction, Lord Barkley giving him an exhibition of £10 a year before he was ten years of age. It is said he outstripped his teachers before he left at seventeen years of age. His translations of Virgil and Juvenal, whilst at this school, were afterwards published in London, and were highly praised by the learned. He wrote an oration in Latin for the funeral of one of his school-fellows. With all his cleverness he was modest, and kind and helpful to his mother, who had been left a widow whilst he was at Wotton. From here he went to the University at Oxford, and became a student of Magdalen Hall. He obtained his degree of M.A., and was so highly thought of by the authorities that he was made a tutor at the University. While holding this position the headmastership of Wotton Free School was offered him, which he declined. Later a similar invitation to become headmaster of Crisp's Free School at Gloucester was sent him. This he accepted, and so pleased were the authorities, who were also magistrates, that they went forth out of the city to meet him and give him a public welcome. This happened in 1641. Here he gave such great satisfaction that the parents of scholars made him such handsome gifts that they proved a greater source of profit to him than his salary. It was here that he was bent on Bible study. Here he discovered that the doctrine of the Trinity was "not well-grounded in Revelation, much less in Reason." He spoke to his friends freely on these matters; and here his troubles began through the treachery of some of his friends.

He was committed to the common gaol December 2, 1645, to be detained there until he could be brought before Parliament in London, who were inspired with Geneva zeal against all such heretics, and who were to determine his punishment. After being allowed bail, he appeared before the Committee appointed by Parliament for his trial. He waited wearily for the issue till April 1, 1647, when he begged, through Sir Harry Vane, to be either judged or discharged. The upshot was that Biddle was committed to the custody of one of their officers, and at the same time was referred to the Presbyterian divines then at Westminster for conviction. He often appeared before them; and at last they petitioned and obtained from Parliament "an Act to put to death all those who held opinions contrary to the Presbyterian Points about the Trinity and other doctrines." Fortunately, Parliament was powerless against the will of the army, whose heretics would be liable under such an Act, which for some time, therefore, became a dead letter. But Biddle was kept in custody for five years. While there he had to keep himself, and spent all he had saved. When he was not able to afford the ordinary meals, and had to be content with a little milk night and morning, a Staffordshire magistrate, who admired him, left him a legacy, and a "learned man" procured him some work in reading Greek proof sheets, which was most welcome and timely help. But what specially grieved Biddle was the way all men shunned him, and scarcely a soul ever visited him in prison. In February, 1651, Parliament passed a general Act of Oblivion. Biddle was released, and at once founded his little society in London. The ministers were deeply offended, but the secular power, just then, favoured liberty of conscience. But in 1654 he was again brought before the Bar of the House of Commons, and on December 3 was committed a close prisoner to the Gatehouse for writing two catechisms for adults and children. Here he was forbidden pen, ink and paper, or the visit of any friend. His books were ordered to be burnt by the common hangman, and nothing less than death was expected by him. But Cromwell dissolved Parliament, and Biddle was released May 28, 1655; but on July 3 he was thrown into prison again—apparently on account of his public discussion with the minister of the Anabaptists, a Mr. Gunning—and was to be tried for his life the next sessions. But Cromwell stepped in again, and knowing it was "not to the interest of his Government either to have Biddle condemned or absolved," he got his heretic out of the country, and kept him in the Isle of Scilly from October 5, 1655, to 1658, when Biddle returned to England. While in exile Cromwell allowed him a hundred crowns a year for fear that, removed from his friends and employment, he might suffer from lack of the necessities of life. For the last four years of his life Biddle apparently escaped being much molested; but on June 1, 1662, he was dragged out of his lodgings, where he and a few friends were gathered together for worship. They were all committed to the public prison, Biddle himself to the dungeon.

His friends were fined £10 and Biddle £100. The Sheriff would have been satisfied with £10 for him, but the enmity of the judge, Sir Richard Brown, was so great that he would not consent to less than the £100 on any terms, threatening him with seven years' imprisonment, even if the £100 were paid. Biddle, therefore, had to remain in prison. But after five weeks of its unwholesome atmosphere and filth he contracted a disease, which in a few days ended his life. Sir Richard Brown could not be induced to grant him removal, but Sheriff Meynel did. On the second day after his release, between 5 and 6 a.m. on September 22, 1662, he passed away, in the forty-seventh year of his life. Before his last imprisonment he had prophesied that another term would kill him, and it did. But he consoled himself with the thought that his work was done, meaning that the truth God had raised him up to profess had been sufficiently brought to light, and there needed only "ingenuity" in men for the embracing and acknowledging of it.

Even more than his zeal for truth was his zeal for holiness of life and manners and for the promotion of piety. He valued his doctrines not for speculation but for practice. He maintained that nothing displeasing to God could be profitable to men, and no religion could benefit a bad man. He made no attempt to bind those who gathered round him in a society to his ways of thinking, but left them full liberty to think for themselves and perform the duty of owning truth according to their conscience. He was a pioneer of free and fearless inquiry into religious truth and opinion. This was the fundamental principle of Biddle and his followers. For at the very beginning of the "Socinian Tracts," of 1691, even before the "Life" of Biddle, there is placed a short paper of three and a half pages—whether by Biddle or another I know not—entitled "An Exhortation to a free and impartial Inquiry into the Doctrines of Religion," where we read, "Learning is an Help both to discover and to defend Truth; but only Freedom and Sincerity are fit to be entirely trusted in that Search." It is this principle of freedom of inquiry which has been one of the chief characteristics of the Unitarian movement from the days of Biddle to our own.

HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD.

"INTRODUCING Henry D. Lloyd, lover of the human race," were the words of Professor Wm. James, when asked for a letter by the subject of this biography. And such we might well expect him to be, for, born an American citizen, he had in his veins the blood of Roundheads, Huguenots, Welsh Quakers, Scotch Covenanters, Italian Waldenses, and Frisian reformers. Such being his descent, we are not surprised to learn that on reaching maturity he could not accept the too rigid Calvinism of his parents, so far as the outward dogmatic form was concerned; but the steadfastness and ethical passion of that creed remained to him and nerved him for the titanic conflicts into which he plunged as a mere youth and in which he fought with the strength of ten till he sank and died under the strain. Though his reforming instincts found vent in ways that his mother, who wished him to enter the ministry, would not have chosen for him, she said of him in after years, "He never did anything that was not obedient, affectionate and noble." He early showed a literary and legal bent, and, as he said himself, chose the legal profession in the hope that he might be able "to right some wrongs." Besides his purely legal studies, he strove to equip himself with a thorough knowledge of economic science and history, as valuable weapons to be used in public warfare. The young crusader, for as such he began and as such he ended his career, was admitted to the Bar in 1869, and speedily, with other reformers, began to make himself felt in public life. In 1872 articles of his on free trade attracted attention, and by a curious coincidence in that year also a conversation is said to have occurred in a refiner's office in which an unknown Cleveland man named John D. Rockefeller propounded a scheme for a combination of refiners. Lloyd's first crusade, however, was against Tammany in 1871, and he had the satisfaction of overthrowing, for the time at least, that many-headed monster.

Before he had completed his law course, he had been concerned with E. L. Godkin D. B. Frothingham, Wm. Lloyd Garrison and others in the formation of the American Free Trade League, but to him, even at that time, free trade did not mean laissez faire and unrestricted competition, but "free producers and free consumers." The defeat of the free trade forces only served to mark out his life work more clearly to him. "Mere literary culture is irksome to me as not being sufficiently practical," he wrote to an intimate friend; "all forms of money-making I despise as pursuits in themselves and for themselves; the law is too technical and traditional; I could take no pleasure in a system that bent my will to those of preceding centuries; I am too unconventionally and unaffectedly pious to be a minister; I can do what ministers can't do. I can be right without being religious." And so he threw himself into journalism, which seemed to him the freest profession, and started on the Chicago Tribune. In 1873 he made a singularly happy marriage, his new home being appropriately named "Felicity Flat," which soon became a rendezvous for all sorts and conditions of thinkers and reformers of every shade of belief. Besides his journalistic work, he founded the Chicago Sunday Lecture Society, being bitterly opposed by all the clergy of the city but Robert Collyer and C. W. Wendte. Meantime, though he was shedding some of the exuberances of youthful opinion, the main principles of his teaching were taking shape. In one of his first editorials he gave expression to a conviction which grew stronger with time: "The methods by which the Vanderbilts, Goulds, Fields, Rockefellers, Mackays, Floods, O'Briens and the coal and iron and salt pachas are heaping up enormous fortunes are methods, not of creation of wealth, but of the redistribution of the wealth of the masses into the pockets of monopolists." He saw clearly that the struggle of his time was to be not for religious nor political, but for industrial liberty, and so he attacked not merely the trusts but the old political economy, with its doctrine of unrestricted competition. No less clearly, as he believed, he saw the remedy. "The idea of collectivity is not new," he said in one of his notes, "but we are on the eve of a great expansion of it—the extension of co-operative industry into politics." One other entry from his note-book we may quote, as it indicates what was now the unalterable bent of his mind. "Let the voice of the people be heard. The voice of the people shall be heard." Thenceforth the vigour and keenness of his mind, the fervour and affection of his heart, were devoted to the cause of working men, the Chicago anarchists, the Spring Valley miners, or whoever had a cause, but lacked an advocate.

An effective article in the Atlantic Monthly for March, 1881, on the evils wrought by railroad companies had some shrewd thrusts at his most powerful enemy. "The Standard (Oil Co.)," he wittily observed, "has done everything with the Pennsylvania legislature except to refine it." After this he began to collect the materials which subsequently, in 1894, formed in "Wealth against Commonwealth" the most deadly attack upon perhaps the most unscrupulous commercial combination that the world has ever known, though, of course, it would be difficult to decide the proportion of iniquity between the particular enterprise attacked in this book and other combinations. No answer has ever been made to his attack, which in every essential particular has been merely reinforced by Miss Ida Tarbell's later work.

The crusades on which this doughty knight sans peur et sans reproche entered cannot all be chronicled here, but we may briefly set down the main principles which he preached and the faith which gave fire and passion to his gospel. He was too many-sided to be catalogued in conventional categories. "Sometimes when I am asked to define myself," he whimsically said, "I say that I am a socialist-anarchist-communist-individualist-collectivist-co-operative-aristocratic-democrat, for as I survey the world, the very complicated thing we call society is rolling forward along all these lines simultaneously." And for all his idealism, his business friends declared that he had an extraordinary capacity for far-sighted investment, and that, had he chosen to devote himself to the making of money, he might have acquired immense wealth. The goal at which he aimed was industrial freedom within a co-operative commonwealth. "Free trade that is free," he said, "will be a trade where the barter is of articles that were freely made as well as freely traded, and 'freely' means in obedience to true laws of honour, health and beauty. Trade that exchanges the product of slave labour, whether of plantation or slum, cannot be free." He was unswerving in his belief that the wages system must be abandoned, and that "everyone must be a working man and every working man free." In "Man the Social Creator" he expounded the religion which was his own inspiration, and which he believed would be the religion of the future. The worst infidelity of all was the disbelief of the people in their own creative powers, the worst atheism, that the ideas of God and Christianity need not prevail in the world of industry. We must have courage, he maintained, to throw away the dead forms of both Church and State. And these words but express what is in the heart of many brave and sincere, and, let us add, spiritually minded men at this hour. "The world cries to-day as never before for a Deliverer, and a religious Deliverer, but he cannot come out of such a Church as I see about me."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

LEGENDS OF JAPAN.

Myths and Legends of Japan. By F. Hadland Davis. With illustrations by Evelyn Paul. London: Harrap & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

THE Japan which is so dear to the heart of Mr. F. Hadland Davis, who has devoted some years already to the study of its legends and poetry, is not the Japan which has risen within recent times to the rank of a first-class Power, proud of its commercial prosperity and naval armaments. Still less is it the Japan of the willow-pattern plate or Liberty fan—a fantastic land of make-believe populated by simpering men and women who bear as little semblance to reality as paper dolls on a Christmas tree. It is, rather, a Japan that has tasted the sorrows and disenchantments of the world no less than its beauty and joyousness—a land of heroisms and renunciations, haunted by ghostly presences, and filled with the consciousness of never-ending life and the divine significance of nature. It has an infinite love for small and exquisite things—the flower of the cherry tree or butterflies "like fragile blossoms flying"; it has also a sinister passion for the horrible and grotesque as many of these tales amply prove; and with it all goes the old samurai spirit—the power of endurance, the capacity for self-sacrifice, and the ardent patriotism which characterise its women quite as much as the men. These things are reflected in its ancient tales as the soul is said to be reflected in the mirrors of Shintō shrines, and as we read them we can understand something of the distress with which those who love this country most are watching the tide of Western civilisation submerge all that was most characteristic in its social and religious life.

It has been said that the Japanese are the happiest people in the world, doubtless one of those impulsive utterances which will not bear strict analysis; but Mr. Davis would fain have us believe it, and undoubtedly he writes like one who has been made happy himself by contact with those who are joyous of heart. He has gathered his myths and legends together as blithely as a child plucking flowers, and all the drudgery of research is forgotten as he relates, with admirable simplicity and a suggestion of quaint humour, the marvellous adventures of Benkei (that quite loveable Japanese hero); the story of the wooing of the Lady Kaguya, child of the Moonfolk, who sets tasks for her suitors after the manner of Portia which they signally fail to perform; the dream of Rosei and his magical translation to a land where

No spring and autumn mark the time,
And o'er that deathless gate
The sun and moon their wonted speed

or those exquisite little tales which enshrine the spirit of the chrysanthemum, the golden lotus, or the pine tree. One needs very little knowledge of legendary lore to be able to trace in the chapters of this fascinating book certain root-ideas which are common to all primitive people, and are expressed by the same symbols in every land; the unending conflict between man and elemental forces, between good and evil, between the children of earth and the denizens of heaven; the transitory triumphs of the wicked and the eternal rewards of the virtuous; the power of hatred to change individuals into goblins and monsters, or of enchanters to lay a spell on hapless maidens; the living personalities that inhabit flowers and trees, and the passions that sap the vitality of men in the form of vampires and wraiths. The great serpent of Omi and the fire-breathing dragon who used to steal into Kyoto to carry off the beloved sons and daughters of the citizens are quite familiar friends. The Goblin Spider, however, and the dreadful old demon-worshipper who was 290 years old, "and opened her eyes with a small stick," are new horrors the like of which we do not remember meeting with before.

We should like to dwell, if we had time, on the legends of Kwannon, the Goddess of Mercy, and Jizō, the tender God of little children adored by Japanese mothers; on the curious tales of Buddha, the flower festivals and festivals of the dead, so perfect in their symbolism, and one or two remarkable stories bearing on the doctrine of Karma which plays such a large part in Buddhist teaching. But we must content ourselves with recommending those who are interested in such things and have not previously made the acquaintance of the fairies, and enchanters, and heroes and divinities of the land of Nippon to buy the book without delay. It is an inexhaustible mine of old-world fancies, steeped in the supernatural, which form the raw material of poetry, and, moreover, help us to understand the life and character of the people who invented them as a more formal work written for this express purpose could hardly do. We congratulate Mr. Davis on the simplicity and directness with which he has accomplished his task no less than on the sensitiveness to beauty and the pathos and significance of humble lives which can be traced in all his work, and which, we think, is more to be desired by those who have it not than the fabled Elixir of Mount Fuji-Yama. He has received valuable assistance from Miss Evelyn Paul, who is responsible for the illustrations which seem to us—though we speak with all the diffidence of the uninitiated—to suggest in a remarkable way the curiously detached spirit of Japanese art. They are beautiful in colouring and original in design. We particularly like the picture of Jizō, in wonderful robes of green and blue and red, with an aureole like the sun, gazing tenderly down at the childish souls clustering round his feet.

RELIGION IN ANCIENT EGYPT.

Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt. By J. H. Breasted, Ph.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.

AFTER the discovery and chronological arrangement of historic material comes the work of interpretation for the filling up of the great drama of human life and thought. Whether, with regard to the Antiquities of Egypt, notwithstanding the marvellous discoveries of recent years, an adequate story of the moral and religious evolution of those remote times is yet possible, may be open to question, the more so that as yet much important material can be dated only in millenniums. But a beginning must sometime be made; and in these ten University lectures Professor Breasted has made the first of such attempts. Restricted as they are by the conditions of delivery, such lectures are not the most satisfactory means of dealing with so vast and intricate a subject. Yet they create popular interest, and here we have a most instructive survey of the rise of a religious system and its attendant morality untouched by alien influence for a period of 2,000 years. As the Sporadic communities of the Nile coalesce into the ordered governments of upper and lower Egypt, unite under the double crown, and thence enter upon a world empire, so religion gathers its local gods into a sort of unstable unity, in which under priestly craft and political exigence Ra, Osiris, Amon or Aton obtain separate pre-eminence and a large identification with each other. Polytheism yields to Henotheism, and this, with empire, extends to Universalism, equalled only in Hebraism of a much later date. The chief interest of these lectures lies in the distinction made between the "Pyramid Texts," "Coffin Texts," and the "Book of the Dead." The first named are from the pyramids of the fifth and sixth dynasties and embrace about 150 years closing with 2475 B.C. Of these there are five copies which in successive redactions reflect the religious and social changes of the time. Evidence of the conditions of Egyptian life in even then remote antiquity appears, as in the mortuary formula for summoning the dead king to life, the expression "Throw off the sand from thy face" sharply contrasts the splendid pyramid mausoleum with the desert sand pit of primitive burial. Of course, such vast and costly homes for the dead could not be produced indefinitely. In 500 years the royal cemetery of Sakkerah had extended to sixty miles of pyramids; and these texts, consisting largely of magic charms for leading the dead king to his home with the Sun God Ra, show that the old idea of the pyramid as a permanent dwelling place of the departed was really obsolete. On the change to ordinary tomb interment, similar texts were painted on the under surface of the coffin lids that the dead might obtain justification. From this the custom grew of writing the charms and magic formulæ on papyrus. And from these at length issued the "Book of the Dead," which so far from being any sort of Egyptian Bible was, like its predecessors, a vade mecum for the departed. Along with the changes in religion, these texts reveal the upgrowth of moral feeling and a need of justification for mortal behaviour. There is no confession of wrong, but such an assertion of personal integrity that, like the stones in our graveyards, suggests an ideal which, whether actual or not, shows what was thought to be demanded at the final judgment. It is not here possible to describe the universalism of Akhnaton, that "God-intoxicated" king, that "first real individual in history," nor to trace the many extremely interesting parallels between Egyptian and Hebrew literature. In a marvellous sense humanity is one. Here is a hymn worthy to rank with the 104th Psalm, an Ecclesiastes or Omar Khayyam, a book of Job and a Messianic ideal of high order. And all this before the Hebrews had entered on the stage of history!

W. WOODING.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT.

Unitarianism. By W. G. Tarrant. London: Constable & Co. 1s. net.

IF illuminating power and the charm of literary aptness are valued by readers, Mr. Tarrant's multum in parvo sketch is assured a wide success. There is nothing quite like it in the various histories and accounts we have hitherto had. The accident of Messrs. Constable requiring a volume on Unitarianism for their useful series on religions, has fortunately been the occasion of a fresh and independent review of the whole subject. The apologetic interest being absent, the obvious aim has been to get things set out in their right proportions. Propottion! That might almost be called a counsel of perfection for the historian. And especially when he has to handle so many competing and tangled issues as those which have made the Unitarian movement what it is to-day. He must not start from, nor unduly stress, 1662. He must speak of Priestley yet not neglect Emerson. Some explanation must be given, or suggested, of the different Unitarian ethos of America as compared with the home product. The Presbyterianising mode of the days of the Lady Hewlett Case must be allowed for, and yet the sense in which we are Presbyterians must be enforced. The general reader must be made to understand why some of us are all for a denomination while others of us would forego present sectarian gains for the sake of wider future results; and how each of these sorts is in some sense conservative and in some, sense radical. The Van has to be mentioned, and also the Free Catholic hope, and the rational and mystical elements have to be illustrated. Martineau has to be brought into strong relief, yet his background must be spared any undue shading. It sounds a forbidding task. Yet it is not even a task, when you go through it with Mr. Tarrant. Perhaps his art (his proportion) carries us on even too pleasantly, for we are scarcely allowed to realise the hollow gulfs we traverse with such security. And there is one circumstance that heightens our sense of safety and delivers us into the writer's power without a single sceptical reservation. There is no sectarian self-laudation. Quiet dignity is all that is permitted; for we stand on solid service rendered to our kind.

If criticism can find a dubious point, it may perhaps inquire whether justice has been done to Martineau's life-long unrest with regard to the failure of the Unitarian movement on the religious side: ranging from 1838 ("I cannot but lament that Unitarianism had a sceptical origin," &c., Carpenter, p. 220) to the doubt of his last years whether our churches were "worth saving." It is true that Mr. Tarrant lets us smile at the great leader's thoroughness in his rôle of candid friend—"with the keen eye for the weaknesses of his fellow-worshippers which always characterised him"—which is well said. But Martineau's criticism is spoken of as if it referred only to ecclesiastical arrangements, or differences about the Bible or philosophy. His "disappointment," spoken of on p. 79, might appear to arise only from his failure to carry the Unitarians with him when he wanted such schemes as the "Free Christian Union," or the system he advocated at Leeds. But even in 1838 he had said, "I confess I cannot attribute our want of progress, as a sect, to defective ecclesiastical arrangements, so much as to the spirit of our religious system, and to the state of mind in which that system has its origin and support." His "Religion of the Spirit" has not even yet come into its own, and Martineau would scarcely have been pleased to see Emerson mentioned (see p. 68) as a representative of that "third stage of Unitarian theology"; for Martineau's profound rightness in regard to the deep springs of religion in human nature was a very different matter from Emerson's sky-blue blandness—a contrast well-pointed by Mr. Tarrant's quotation of Lord Morley's criticism of Emerson's optimism (it was Matthew Arnold's criticism, by the way, before it was Morley's).

However, all this could scarcely be worked out in the small space at command; and we are deeply grateful for what Mr. Tarrant has done for us.

THE RELATION OF MIND TO BODY.

The Mechanistic Conception of Life. By Jacques Loeb. University of Chicago Press and Cambridge University Press. 6s. net.

The Psychology of Insanity. By Bernard Hart. Cambridge University Press. 1s. net.

THESE two books lying side by side on my table for review suggest a thought or two about the changes in the attitude of our minds towards this perennially interesting and important problem to all men and women, and particularly to the religious minded, of the relation of mind to body; of soul and its immortality to birth, disease, and death.

The Hellenic Greeks, and, of course, the old Egyptians long before them, and the Old Testament writers had all their distinctive views about the problem of the relation of body to mind, as had Buddhist and Confucian authorities; but the modern interest in the subject grew up as a result of a change of attitude in regard to research on this subject, which has led to the abandonment of the philosophical mode of inquiry* in favour of the scientific. At the early part of last century a group of writers existed, united, however, by no special theory so as to form a school of thought, whom Professor Ribot described as the a priory psychologists, of whom Sir W. Hamilton was perhaps its most distinguished and Dr. Thomas Brown one of its most popular members. All the writers in this group were learned and interesting men, though their books are now little studied, because their theories were often so far away from the region of reality and experience as to prove of little value. The men who succeeded them were again a group of students rather than a school, but they all had this in common, that they believed fundamentally in a direct appeal to fact rather than speculation, and from James Mill to Lewes, Bain, Herbert Spencer, Maudsley, and Ribot, they tended to place increasing importance on the body as the causative agent of the mind and to interpret mind, soul, or spirit in terms of matter. It was not without justification that this class of thinkers came to be known as materialistic, and caused even such a decided biologist as Huxley to denounce its tendency as unsound.

A third stage of thought was reached about the middle of last century by the assumption that mind and matter are both aspects and manifestations of a deeper reality which includes them both, and to this monistic conception of life some extremely careful and guarded scientific students such as Romanes and Lloyd Morgan belonged and still belong.

Nevertheless, it is probably not far from the truth to assert that all these three phases of research are dead, having given place to a more rigid method of inquiry, that of studying the bodily manifestations of consciousness by physiological methods and the psychological manifestations of consciousness by psychological methods, not of speculation, as was the case with the Hamilton school, but of observation. The most complete, though perhaps because of this completeness rather too speculative, exponents of this school were William Cycles,† and after him William James, "Principles of Psychology," 1890, ten years later.

The first writer, however, who was able to demonstrate the possibility of observing the processes of the mind was undoubtedly Sir Francis Galton in his book "Inquiries into Human Faculty," published in 1883 (re-published in Everyman's Library, Dent, 1s. net), and his important discovery of different kinds of thinking in different individuals upset most of the older views of logic and at the same time disclosed what a vast unexplored area is this country of the mind. But meanwhile parallel studies to those of the mind had been going on in the endeavour to discover how far a purely mechanistic study of what had hitherto been regarded as conscious phenomena can be given, and up to the present time such studies have tended to increasingly interpret the lowest forms of animal and almost all vegetable life, in mechanistic phraseology and by mechanistic laws.

Here is a very interesting situation, on the one hand mind seems to be much more of a reality than was formerly conceived, and on the other all the lowest forms of life which have been supposed to be conscious seem now to be explainable very largely upon a purely materialistic basis, and such forms are therefore either not conscious, or, if conscious, their consciousness at its beginning can be materialistically explained. Professor Loeb maintains that in time the facts of psychology will be explainable simply by organic chemistry. Dr. Bernard Hart thinks insanity can be largely explained without any reference to bodily states. Loeb's view would mean, if true, the recognition that mind, soul, or consciousness die with the body at bodily death, while Hart's would offer, not only a hope, but almost a certain demonstration that mind or soul survive death. Professor Loeb and his school working slowly up from the lowest forms of life to higher forms, and Dr. Hart and others studying first human consciousness, because this is the only direct consciousness known to us, will work downwards from higher to lower human forms. The interesting moment will come, and it probably will be many years yet, when they meet.

Professor Loeb's book is the larger, and perhaps the more authoritative, it is trustworthy, though giving a little too much prominence to the American school of research, but all its philosophical passages are extremely weak, while Dr. Hart's volume is a little too speculative, but, in spite of this, extremely interesting.

For sincere religious students wishful to study the recent thought of science, Professor Loeb's work is to be recommended, if it is carefully kept in mind that there is another no less scientific school, to which Dr. Hart, following Sir Francis Galton, belongs, which holds very different opinions as to the origin of consciousness, and that science is likely to remain in this undecided state for many years yet to come, and therefore no school of thought has a right to claim her adhesion.

Recent studies of the mind in higher forms of life have very distinctly favoured a spiritualistic interpretation, and if a mechanistic explanation seems the more satisfactory in the lower animals, this may be due to the fact that the lower animals are not conscious as the higher are, and religion would then be relieved of one of its greatest difficulties of discovering the exact significance of mind at what are now thought to be its instinctive and subconscious stages.

JESUS IN MODERN FICTION.

The Promise of the Christ-Age in Recent Literature. By W. E. Mosher, Ph.D. London: Putnam's. 5s. net.

DR. MOSHER has had the interesting and useful idea of bringing together in one volume some of the striking pictures of Christ which have been presented in novels of this century on the Continent and in America. A close observer of the intense ferment of thought upon religious subjects and the literary activity thereby stirred up in Germany and other countries, he tells us things which will make us alert to watch for further signs, as e.g., that French poetry and drama have lately shown a tendency towards a more religious attitude, and that in Germany a portion of the working people have outgrown the materialistic philosophy of Marx. But his main point is that Continental popular literature shows at once the abandonment of orthodox theological and church views, and an ever-increasing preoccupation with the life and message of Jesus. While the nineteenth century produced no "finished work of a notable writer," giving an artistic or imaginative representation of Christ, this kind of work is "strikingly characteristic of the belles-lettres of the past decade and a half." Jacob Wassermann in "The Jews of Zirndorf" (1906) concludes with the result "But they do need a Saviour," and our author thinks that this natural human longing for a perfect and saving personality is the real "program" of the present. He appears to suggest that the theological interpretations of the person of Christ (whether we take the traditional or the humanitarian view) are of no importance, while, on the other hand, the belief in the greatness and historical importance of Jesus is held to have an undeniable religious significance, in view of the longing of our day for a more vital faith in the value and meaning of life.

The novels which indicate these modern tendencies fall into three groups. First, those which broadly stand for the view of the importance of Christ as above stated. These are "Hilligenlei," by Gustav Frenssen, and "Miracles of the Anti-Christ," by the Swedish authoress, Selma Lagerlöf. The second group deal with some event or phase in the life of Jesus—Sudermann's "John," Rostand's "Samaritan Woman," Widmann's "The Saint and the Animals," and Andreyev's "Judas." Thirdly, there are those in which the chief character bears a striking resemblance to Jesus—Kennedy's "Servant in the House," Fogazzaro's "Saint," Pontoppidan's "Promised Land," and Hauptmann's "The Fool in Christ." The plot is outlined in each case. The book gives the material for forming a judgment, rather than any definite conclusions arrived at by the author. There is no doubt that Dr. Mosher has succeeded in isolating in clear relief a notable and significant set of facts and problems.

old moorings. "Dogma is being not so much disproved as outgrown." Many throw aside all care for things beyond the things of this world, and devote themselves to having a good time or to helping others to have a good time. But there are others who feel that some reconstruction of belief that will satisfy both our intellectual and our emotional nature is one of the most urgent needs of the day. Such men will find in Mr. Hill a sane and reliable guide, who will teach them to think out their own difficulties and their own demands. That man's spirit should survive the death of the body seems a necessity to Mr. Hill, if this world is not irrational through and through. The belief in this survival may be obtained in two ways, first by direct intuition—the way of the mystic, second by scientific investigation and demonstration—the way of the Society for Psychical Research. With both of those ways Mr. Hill deals in sympathetic fashion, though he admits that the path of the mystic is not for him. With regard to the method of science his general conclusion is that "by help of the scientific evidence for survival, even the non-mystic may escape from materialism, and may once more see the world as a rational and ultimately satisfactory affair."

SPOKEN WORDS OF PRAYER AND PRAISE.

By S. A. Tipple. London: James Clarke & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

THE contents of this volume of "Pulpit Prayers and Prayerful Meditations" were taken down from time to time, as they were uttered, by a member of the congregation to which for so many years Mr. Tipple ministered. We are thankful that he consented to the publication, adding this to the volume of sermons and prayers, "Sunday Mornings at Norwood," published thirty years ago, and the "Days of Old and other Sermons," to which a few prayers were also added, issued last year after his retirement from active service. This further gift comes to us with the personal touch of a tender dedication, "To the dear Memory of C. T., now among 'the lost who are found in the deathless land,' one of whose last expressed wishes is fulfilled in the issue of this volume." It is not only the members of Mr. Tipple's congregation who will treasure these prayers. More even than the printed word of sermons, they enable us to enter into the spirit of his ministry, and there will be many, if we mistake not, who will feel it a privilege, in quiet hours of communion, to be gathered, through the help of these pages, into the fellowship of trust and aspiration, which speaks here with such a living voice. Old friends will be glad, and new friends will be gathered in, to realise that here is still the power of a true ministry, which is the kindling of soul from soul in the Divine Presence. There is nothing formal or conventional in these prayers. They are some of them probably fragments of what was actually uttered in the hour of worship, but they are genuine words of life—sometimes in the shadow, and aware of the burden of mystery, not pretending that the bitter and evil things of human destiny are not there, but believing always in the light and the Eternal Goodness, looking up and striving upward to the more perfect truth and love of God. A few of the titles, which indicate the main thought in each prayer, will help to give some idea of the rich contents of the book: "The One Presence with us and in all." "A Home in us for God, that we may have our Home in Him." "Seeing with Jesus, and rejoicing in things old and new." "We believe in God, the Father Almighty, who cries within us, in our cries." "The Intimate God, whom seeking to express in our creeds, we leave ever unexpressed." "The ever-abiding Presence with us, whether the sense of it is ours or not." "The Gift of Receptiveness, and the Joy of going on." "The Blessedness of seeing Him who is Invisible." "It is He that hath made us—'the Heralds of a Higher Race.'" "Amidst all this unintelligible world, to trust in God and do good." While such volumes as this and the "Pulpit Prayers" of Alexander MacLaren issue from the press, there is no reason to fear that the power of living utterance in prayer is to be a thing only of the past. Differences of administration there will doubtless be, but the one Spirit in true ministry.

How to Win is the title of a volume of addresses by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., mostly delivered by him as a lay-preacher. They are vigorous and straightforward, evidently the utterances of an earnest and devout man, and warm with living interest. Mr. Chancellor's book, indeed, may well serve as a model to many a minister, as well as the brethren who from time to time do duty in the absence of professional teachers and guides. Going upon the well-beaten track of assured experience, he spends his time, not in theorising, but in making application of religious ideas to the everyday life of old and young. Here is a refreshing candour apart from self-assertion. It is impossible to read one of these addresses without being stirred to deeper zeal after personal and social betterment. The book should have a wide circulation. (Lindsey Press. 2s. net.)

ALL residents in London, or visitors, who are interested in the history of its old buildings and classic scenes—and who is not?—would do well to add a new volume to their resources of information—The Inns of Court and of Chancery (Macmillan, 1s.). There are few places in the metropolis so crowded with interesting associations, and happily much of the old-world air of the buildings survives. Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Lent Reader at the Middle Temple, was responsible (if we mistake not) for the idea of a series of lectures on the several Inns there by representative King's Counsel, and the book now presents them to the public. The lectures by Mr. J. Douglas Walker (Lincoln's), and Mr. H. E. Duke, M.P. (Gray's), will probably attract the lay mind in a special degree, but for care and charm the two by Dr. Odgers himself easily take first place. The first of these opens the book with a comprehensive view (aided by a portion of Agas's map,

The other closes the series with reminiscences of "Literary Men" connected with them. For wealth of fact combined with lightness of touch these two lectures are admirable. The topographical story is so well told that it seems hypercriticism to point out that Dr. Odgers appears to put the site of "Strand Bridge" somewhat farther west than it should have been. It is usually placed, not at the present Wellington-street, but just east of St. Mary's Church, a position confirmed by the plan supplied by the Elizabethan cartographer.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE LAND OF NO CHRISTMAS.

It was my first visit to that country, and, as I descended from the pass, the curiosity that had sustained me on the long climb up from the other side gave way to sensations of delight. It was a lovely land, as fertile as beautiful. Once clear of the mountain-ridge, the low foot-hills rolled slowly to the horizon, a green sea of quiet, sheltering broad valleys where clear streams ran, singing, between lush meadows abounding in cattle. And here and there the white road ran through orchard lands rich with fruit and musical with the singing of birds. Whether it was the sweet restfulness of the scenery as compared with the rugged strenuousness of the rocky gorge by which I had lately toiled to the pass, or whether it was, as it seemed, something native to the air of the place, I know not, but I felt a perfect content steal over me as I advanced, and I found myself unconsciously murmuring of Innis-free:

And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow, Dropping from the veils of the morning to where the cricket sings;
There midnight's all a glimmer, and noon a purple glow,
And evening full of the linnet's wings.

Here, thought I, was the very land for a real Utopia. Surely the people of such a place must be very happy. I pictured to myself a kindly and courteous race, breathing a sweet content and filled with a gentle piety, singing beautiful songs in simple words to native harmonies as they went about their work. Their houses, I imagined, would be full of lovely things, for surely in a land so blessed by nature man would have leisure for the things that matter. Earning a living here would not interfere overmuch with living. Every man would be an artist or a craftsman, and that not out of the need for gold, but out of the elemental love of expression. Yes, and all men would be brethren, and there would be no oppression or unlove at all. I longed to meet these people. Perhaps—who could tell?—knapsack and staff might be cast aside for ever. Would they judge me worthy?

Presently I saw two men coming along the road, and I hurried gladly towards them. As I drew nearer I noticed, to my astonishment, that their garments were not graceful at all, but, indeed, very like my own, though coarser. I observed, too, that they paced side by side without a word. Perhaps they were silent, thought I, because they were those friends—the best of all—who can bear each other's silence; or perhaps they had come far and were tired.

"Good morning, friends," I cried, with a smile, as we met. They scowled and passed me by without a word. In surprise, I stood and looked after them, and saw them glance back suspiciously over their shoulders at me time after time. It was not at all the behaviour that I had expected, but I concluded at last that they must be strangers to that country like myself. Anyway, I should soon get to know the real people of the country, for a little way ahead of me I could see the sign of an inn, and even in my own country one is always sure of good cheer and a warm welcome at an inn. So I entered the inn when I came to it, smiling cheerfully as I threw down my knapsack.

"Good day, brother," I called out as a man, apparently the landlord, entered the bar from an inner room.

"I'm not your brother," he answered in a surly tone. "What do you want?"

It seemed to me that I must have trodden on a particularly painful corn without knowing it. Perhaps he had had a brother who was anything but fraternal. I decided to be patient.

"Don't be angry, friend," I said. "I have come far and would like a little refreshment."

"Friendship seems to be cheap where you come from," he growled. "What sort of refreshment do you want?"

Without any further attempt at pacifying him I gave my order, and presently he brought my victuals on a tray; but he refused to set them before me until I had paid the bill. I ate and drank and hurried off as quickly as I could, not surprised at receiving no reply to my parting salutation.

The inn was at the commencement of the village, and, although my first expectations as to the nature of the people in this country had been so rudely dispelled, I still hoped that the true inhabitants would come nearer to my picture of them. As I advanced into the village I saw the urchins of the place playing in the street. I stopped to watch them, and was pained to find that all the games were spoiled because the children, instead of giving their attention to the game itself, spent their energies either in trying to detect their playmates in the act of cheating or in endeavouring to score by illicit methods themselves. Every few minutes some game or other broke up and changed into a fight. I was about to step forward to speak to the youngsters in the endeavour to inculcate a better spirit of play amongst them when my attention was attracted by the merry laughter of a tiny baby, too young to walk, who was squatting on the ground by a garden gate, pelting with his baby hands some fluttering object. I went nearer and found to my horror and dismay that the object was a robin, tied by one leg to a gatepost. It was evident that the bird had been tied in that way to amuse the child by its fearful flutterings and to provide a target for his unconscious cruelties.

Now every sentimentalist has a soft place in his heart for the robin; but to me the red-breast has particularly tender associations. For you must know that in my youth I sojourned for a time in Bohemia, and picked up many of the customs and beliefs of the Bohemians. In those days the robin was the sacred bird of Bohemia, and its image appeared above all the altars in the land as the symbol of the typically Bohemian virtues of hopefulness and trustfulness. Of course, the robin has long since been ousted by chanticleer in the veneration of the Bohemian, and it has become, I am informed, almost as extinct there as the wild oat which, though once so plentiful, is not now to be met with anywhere in that country. However, my love for the robin remains strong, amounting, indeed, almost to a form of worship, and I no sooner saw the plight of the little creature than I rushed forward and tenderly released it. Immediately, the child set up a hideous screaming that attracted the attention of every other child in the street. The moment they caught sight of me they rushed upon me.

"A stranger," they cried. "A stranger!"

Without more ado the garbage of the gutter began to descend upon me, flung from a hundred hands. Struggle was in vain. I was grossly outnumbered. Shelter was impossible, for from the houses the mothers looked out and screamed with cruel laughter at my plight. There was nothing left to me but flight. Shielding my face as much as possible with my hands, I rushed blindly along the street and out into the country until the pelting and the laughter ceased. I wiped the rubbish from my clothes as far as was possible, and, hot and angry, pushed on a little further until I came to a smithy. There, at least, I thought, I should be safe, and welcome to dry my clothes. I leaned over the half-door and was about to greet the smith in a humble and subdued manner when he looked up and shouted angrily,

"Get out of the light, you fool!"

To emphasise his words he rushed at me, swinging his hammer viciously. I ran from him, and he leaned over the door and shouted threats and insults after me. It was the last straw. I could hold out no longer. As soon as I got beyond hearing of his shouts I sat by the wayside and wept bitterly.

Little more than a couple of hours had passed since I set foot in that country. I had entered it with joy, for never had I seen so fair a land or built up such pleasant expectations in my mind. Alas! how I had been disappointed! I had come with kindness in my heart and friendly greetings on my lips, and I had been received with unkindness on every hand. Even the babes had beaten me. My heart was very sore, and my mind could suggest no explanation to assuage my grief.

Looking up presently, I saw an old man leaning on a stick and looking down upon me in a curious way. There was no trace of pity in his face, but merely a show of interest as though he saw in me something that might serve to beguile the tedium of an old man's day.

"What is the matter?" he asked.

His appearance was not such as to lead me to expect much from him, but I felt the need of unburdening myself to some one, and I was sure that no one could listen quietly to my story without displaying some sympathy with me. Bidding him sit down beside me I recounted my experiences. The old man looked blankly at me until I had finished, and then, with an air of great perplexity, he said,

"I am afraid I do not understand. What is it that makes you feel so hurt? Surely you did not expect as a stranger to be treated any differently?"

"Sir," said I, "you surprise me! Do you mean to say that you have so little idea of hospitality—"

"Hospitality!" said the old man. "What is hospitality?"

He pronounced the word slowly, syllable by syllable, as though it were quite a new word to him, and it was obvious that he really did not know its meaning. It was my turn to stare blankly at him. For the life of me I could not define the word.

"In the first place," he went on at last, "my son at the inn sold you what you required, did he not?"

"Your son!" I cried. "So the inn-keeper is your son?"

"Yes," said he, in a tone of utter indifference. "But we have not spoken for thirty years. He was lazy, and I turned him out."

"What!" I cried. "Do you mean to say that in all that time you have never forgiven each other?"

"You use strange words that I do not understand, sir," said the old man. "What is 'forgiven'?"

I explained the meaning of the word to him, and he laughed scoffingly when I had done so.

"We are not fools in this country," he said, "and we never do what you call forgive. If a man injures me, he has injured me. If two men quarrel, they have quarrelled. How can things be otherwise? In your country people must be very insincere. As I was saying, I have not spoken to my son for thirty years—not since one day towards the end of a December, when—"

"At Christmas time!" I cried. "Do you mean to say that you turned your own son out of doors at Christmas time?"

Again he looked bewildered.

"'Christmas,'" he said, "what is that?"

I looked him straight in the eyes. He was not joking. A light dawned upon me.

"Do you mean to say that you have no Christmas in this country?" I demanded.

"Not to my knowledge," replied the old man. "But what is it?"

"Sir," said I, "you have explained everything to me. I bid you good day."

And so saying I hurried as fast as I could over the border to the City of Waking, where Santa Claus himself met me at the gate.

RUSHING WIND.

"Blow, blow, thou winter wind!"

RUSHING Wind comes down the hillside,
Rustles through the tall bullrushes,
Lightly trips across the meadows,
Leaps the hedges,
Bends the tree-tops,
Bounds and dances on the tree-tops.

Rushing Wind his flute is playing Piping softly in the pine trees.
Rushing Wind his harp is playing,
Singing while his harp he's playing
To the tall trees in the forest;
For he loves the forest brothers
And he makes them shake with laughter,
And anon with joy he wrestles
With the burly forest brothers.

But when passion deep and tragic
Animates his soul majestic
You shall hear the waves of music
Throbbing from his great sea-organ.

I have lain upon the downland
In the evening, in the summer,
With my head amongst the grasses
Where the butterflies, with blue wings,
Silken wings and wings of sapphire,
Rest upon the grass head-downwards,
And have heard, O very faintly,
Rushing Wind in downy whispers
Murmuring on the edge of daylight,
On the dusky way to darkness,
Sleep-songs to his least of children.
All the winged folk, least and greatest,
Moth and bee and bat and eagle,
Rushing Wind doth call his children.

In the glamour of the Dog-days,
By the dazzling seas of August,
Rushing Wind, too tired to rolick,
Sinks down on the burning pebbles
On the seashore, lies there panting,
Panting, breathing very lightly,
With his fingers in the water
Reaching out to tease the wavelets.

But when day and night are equal,
When the sun hath lost his ardour,
And the labour of the strong man
Has become a joyous pastime,
Rushing Wind leads out his chargers,
Horses grey and horses snowy,
Drives them wildly o'er the ocean,
O'er the ridges of the waters,
Flying swift from bay to foreland
While the spray like dust is scattered.

Rushing Wind is full of laughter,
Full of fun and full of frolic;
Hear him rattle at the windows,
Hear him burble down the chimney,
Hear him whining at the corner,
See him racing down the causeway;
Off go hats, out go umbrellas!
Rushing Wind laughs rude and loudly.

When the black frost seals the marshes
Rushing Wind grows dour and surly, Hard his heart and harsh his voice is
When he gathers up the sand, and Flings it stinging in our faces.
He has hunted with the wolf-packs
On the black Siberian tundras,
Hounds of hunger follow barking,
Ravens grave fly round him croaking, Pitiless he drives the birds from

Off the trees and through the hedges;
In the dark they fly before him
Dazed, to shelter in the tussocks,
In the copses of the hazel,
In the thick and thorny gorses,
Till his cruel rage is over.

Hark! I hear the great war trumpet;
Rushing Wind hath blown his challenge,
And the woods have heard and answered,
Shouted back their bold defiance.
I have heard him in the Springtime
Warbling softly like a linnet;
I have heard him in the night-time
Shriek and batter in his anger;
I have seen him with his horses
Grandly leap the ocean furrows;
But in battle with the forest,
Struggling with the oaks and beeches,
Rushing Wind is in his glory.
Then he calls his sons and daughters,
Calls his clansmen, calls his heroes,
Mounted on their leaping horses,
Rattling harnesses to battle,
Panting with immense exertion,
Till the shock when foe with foeman
Meets, and earth and trees are shaken.
Hand to hand the heroes wrestle,
Giants fall and limbs are broken,
But the ground is well disputed.
Rushing Wind retreats to gather
Up his force again in onset.
Then, once more, his trumpet bellows,
Then he shouts, the trees shout to him;
Rushing Wind lays on, and swaying,
Staggering, creaking, groaning, crashing,
Waving arms and force defying,
Still the trees defend their fastness,
Till the battle ends, and after,
Wind and forest make a peace-pact,
Sing each other's deeds of valour,
While the trees brood o'er the battle,
Heal them of their wounds and bruises;
Rushing Wind brings gracious tribute,
Pours the rain upon their branches,
Gives much drink to all their branches.

Tired is Rushing Wind and weary,
He has spent his mighty forces
And in sleep must seek renewal;
Sleep that holds the magic fountains
Where the toilers, weak and weary,
Drink in silence, drink in darkness,
And awake with newborn prowess.
In the valleys of the mountains
Rushing Wind his bed has fashioned,
He, the wrestler strong, the singer,
As a weary child reposes,
As the infant Samuel slumbered
In the house of God at Shiloh.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. S. A. TIPPLe.

WE regret very much that we are obliged to hold over our memorial notice of the Rev. S. A. Tipple till next week. Owing to the misadventures of the Christmas season the manuscript was lost temporarily in the post, and reached the printers too late to be included in our present issue.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE IN LIVERPOOL.

THE results have recently been given of the fourth census of attendances at the churches, chapels, and mission halls of Liverpool taken for the Daily Post and Mercury. The whole area of Greater Liverpool, from the river to West Derby, and from Garston to Fazakerley, was covered. The total attendances were 160,721, which shows a falling off of no less than 18,056 since the last census was taken in 1902, although there are several factors to be taken into account which partially account for this decline. The places of worship included in the census have increased from 384 in 1902 to 502. The sectional aggregates for 1902 and for December 8, with the increases or decreases, are:— 1902.	1912.

Anglican	67,898	57,932	Dec. 9,966
Nonconformist.	66,712	52,462	Dec. 14,250
Roman Catholic	35,330	38,262	Inc. 2,932
Various Missions	8,837	12,065	Inc. 3,228

Though numerically the second body of worshippers, the adherents of the larger Nonconformist bodies show the greatest decline, but if the people attending the various undenominational and Salvation Army halls be classified as Nonconformists, the leakage is reduced to 11,022 against an Anglican decline of 9,966. It should be noted that neither the Bible Classes nor the P.S.A. gatherings, which are now so popular on Sunday afternoons, are included. A correspondent to the Daily Post points out, however, that the Nonconformist returns are not quite complete, as within his knowledge forty-five Nonconformist places of worship or mission halls, Wesleyan, Baptist, Primitive Methodists, Presbyterian, and so forth, were not included in the count. Also a number of places set down under "Various Denominations" are bona-fide missions attached to Nonconformist churches. The Unitarian churches—Ancient Chapel, Toxteth; Domestic Mission Chapel, Beaufort-street; Hamilton-road Chapel, Hope-street Church, Renshaw-street Chapel, North End Domestic Mission, Bond-street; Ullet Road Church, Domestic Mission, Mill-street, and Heald-street Mission, achieve a total of 979 as compared with 1,266 in 1902, and 1,310 in 1891. There is an increase of 2,932 in the attendances at the Roman Catholic churches. The largest congregations were those at the Sun Hall (4,090), the Central Hall (2,340), St. Nicholas's Parish Church (1,208), Kirkdale Wesleyan Church (1,080), and St. Lawrence's, Kirkdale (1,000).

NEW GRAVEL PIT CHURCH, HACKNEY.

On Sunday last, the annual prize distribution to the scholars of the Sunday school took place, Mr. J. S. Harding, in the regretted absence of Mrs. Harding, handing the books to the boys and girls. In the speeches Mr. Harding and Mr. Lister reviewed the work of the past year, during which good progress had been made. The Boys' Brigade continues to do good work.

A Girls' Own Brigade has been started, and flourishes. The kindergarten, which began last February, is in danger of being as overcrowded as the rest of the school, and new scholars have to be refused admittance. The Teachers' Preparation and Bible Class, carried on throughout the year, has been well attended. Nearly £90 was paid into the bank during the year. There has been an increase of ten in the number of teachers, who attend regularly Sunday by Sunday, and do their work well. The School Building Extension Fund is making satisfactory headway, and it is hoped to have new buildings put up during the next twelve months. The Superintendent (Miss Green) and teachers of the school are to be congratulated on the general efficiency evident throughout.

THE BIBLE IN ESPERANTO.

DURING the past week the literature of Esperantists has been enriched by two notable works—a translation of the New Testament, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and a new Esperanto English dictionary, compiled by Mr. E. A. Millidge. The Old Testament is now in course of translation by the author of the International Language, Dr. Zamenhof, of Warsaw, and the Pentateuch, Ecclesiastes, and the Book of Psalms have already been published. The New Testament will undoubtedly form a welcome Christmas gift book among Esperantists in many parts of the world. Portions of the New Testament have previously been published in Esperanto, notably an edition of St. John's Gospel, published by the Scripture Gift Mission, being a translation from the Greek original. The new edition will be of great assistance in enabling the Esperantist readers to understand difficult passages. Thus the word translated in the Authorised and Revised Versions as "mote," and in the XXth Century New Testament as "splinter" (Luke vi. 41) is in the new edition translated "ligneto," meaning a small particle of wood. The dictionaries give "mote" as meaning a small particle, a speck, or atom of floating dust (not necessarily of wood). The whole verse is thus rendered: "Kiel vi povas diri al via frato, Frato, lasu min eltiri la lignereton kiu estas en via okulo; kiam vi ne rigardas la trabon kiu estas en via propra okulo? Hipokritulo! Unue forjhetu la trabon el via okulo, kaj tiam vi klare vidos por eljheti la lignereton kiu estas en la okulo de via frato."

The British and Foreign Bible Society publish the edition in several bindings at prices from 2s. upwards.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE REAL QUEEN VICTORIA.

We are grateful to Sir Harry Johnston for his article on "Drake" in the Cornhill Magazine, in which he deprecates very strongly the habit of presenting our national heroes to the public as glorified individuals without either the physical imperfections or human failings which characterise less exalted people. He gives as an illustration a reminiscence from his own early days, when it was the custom to represent Queen Victoria as a lovely young girl or beautiful matron, and describes the shock which he received when he first saw Linley Samborne's realistic drawing of Her Majesty's face in a full-page cartoon for Punch in the middle eighties. "One saw here no vapid matron of placid comeliness, but a sad, far-seeing, hard-worked woman of the world, a Ruler, even in small things an autocrat; a human being of strong prejudices, jealousies and dogmatisms; yet a personality so strong, so influential, that the student of character would have turned to look at such a face more than once in an omnibus, a church, or a shop, even though it were but the face of a short, sturdy widow-woman, plainly dressed, and of no social importance."

* * *

"THOUGH at first," Sir Harry Johnston continues, "this bold departure in the pages of Punch—so utterly unlike the work of Tenniel or Leech—was regarded as slightly disloyal, the desire to realise Queen Victoria as she really was gained ground; and henceforth, even (imperfectly) on the coinage—truthful representations of her supplanted the intolerably false and vulgar portraits of the sixties and seventies. With this abandonment of the Madame Tussaud's ideal grew rapidly an appreciation of the Queen's real character and worth which made the loyalty of the last fourteen years of her reign a very strong factor in British Imperial politics."

THE CRAZE FOR ADVERTISING.

The pleasure of travelling by train through the prettiest parts of the country is often marred by the sight of ugly boards in crude colours, advertising somebody's superior cocoa, mustard, or pills. But new horrors are in store for us, if one of the remarkable inventions shown at the advertising exhibition at the Horticultural Hall "catches on" with the railway companies. It consists of a screen covering the whole of the window through which, until the train has started, everything can be clearly seen in the ordinary way, but as soon as it moves from the platform an advertisement appears on the screen at which the passengers are supposed to stare until the next station is reached, when it instantly disappears. Surely the much enduring public will not submit to this new form of hypnotism in the name of commercial enterprise. It is even worse than the glittering advertisements of whisky which are flashed across the Thames at night, and which are the despair of those who go down to the Embankment from the crowded Strand to hear the water lapping against its grey walls and watch the reflections of the stars in the dark swirl of the river.

HOW TO MAKE WORK IN THE MILL POPULAR.

The lack of operatives in Lancashire and Yorkshire, which seems to be increasing, is causing some anxiety to the mill owners, who will have to do something to attract the young people, as Mr. J. A. Schofield recently told the Lancashire section of the British Association of Managers of Textile Works, if they do not wish to fall back upon the alternative of importing the cheap foreign worker. Mr. Schofield went into the whole question of the unpopularity of the mill very thoroughly, and the suggestions he made as to reforms best calculated to overcome the prejudice against mill-life show that he takes a wide and sympathetic view of the matter.

* * *

As managers, he said, their efforts should be (a) to improve the moral tone of mill work; (b) to drop names having associations of bad repute; (c) cleaning up should be done by special employees; the workers be encouraged to dress in suitable clothes, dressing rooms provided, and going-home clothes kept away from workroom, to encourage pride in personal appearance; (d) the periods of work should be reduced or broken by intervals of rest, recreation, and refreshment; smoke and tea rooms should be provided, and ten-minute intervals after about two hours' work, short talks, songs, or any amusing entertainment, all being encouraged to take part; (e) early rising, a national matter, eight hours day, dining-rooms, suitable cooked foods provided at cost prices or on co-operative arrangements, proper dining crockery, &c.; (f) younger employees should be encouraged to continue classes, and short lessons given by paid teacher from the office staff; (g) the education system of the country should be altered to enable children to get instruction in more than one occupation. Such a programme will doubtless sound very Utopian to some people, and the common objection will be urged that "it will cost money." Mr. Schofield anticipated this by pointing out that if the present drift of things continued, and the industry did not retain its best workers and keep up a supply of good new workers, the trade would pass from this country.

UNIVERSITIES' MISSION TO CENTRAL AFRICA.

The Universities' Mission to Central Africa was proposed by Dr. Livingstone in 1857, and it was organised at first by the two older Universities. To-day, however, the work is shared by the Universities of Durham and London, and in view of the activities of the mission in remote districts of Zanzibar, Nyasaland, and Northern Rhodesia, it should scarcely need to plead for adequate support in the centres of learning which claim to be specially interested in its efforts. The work of a mission like this is pioneer work in every sense of the word, and its object is not religious instruction merely, but education and civilisation, and the spread of knowledge in regard to disease, habits of cleanliness, industry, and a peaceable life, which have worked wonders in places where tribal feuds and the horrors of the slave traffic formerly made existence precarious and wretched. It matters little under what religious banner such noble work is done. It must be undertaken as part of the responsibility laid upon the British Empire in regard to the native races under her rule, and there can be nothing but the warmest sympathy and admiration for the men who go out to these wild regions in Africa and work together there, without any stipend or worldly profit, for the love of God and the welfare of mankind.
